"I could have walked away, but we built something and then we want to take it to the next step," she added later. That next step is winning back control of the House, she said - only then will she think about leaving.

Pelosi appointed a 42-year old New Mexico Latino lawmaker with no national profile to help lead the Democrats back to the majority in 2016. She gave an ally from the New York suburbs a new role as a top caucus spokesman. And she put two women - a Connecticut liberal and a black woman from Maryland's Prince George's County - in charge of doling out committee assignments.

In addition to Minority Whip Steny H. Hoyer (D-Md.) and the third-in-command, Rep. James E. Clyburn (D-S.C.), Pelosi's team now presents more age, gender, racial and geographic balance. But she emphasized that they will continue reporting to her until Democrats retake control of the House.

"It depends on what members want," she said. "But I thought I'd be long gone by now."

"I thought we'd win the third term in the majority [in 2010] and I would have completed some of the work," she added. "I'm not here because I want to have the accoutrement of being leader. I'm here because we have a mission to accomplish for the American people."

Pelosi became speaker in 2007 after her party won 230 seats in the 2006 midterms. She may be left next year with just 185 seats, a steep drop that could take 10 years for to reverse.

In recent interviews, House Democrats universally agreed that Pelosi's leadership position was safe after she raised more than a record $101 million for the party in the past two years, but after the decisive losses some hinted that it may be time to start thinking about new leadership.

"People don't follow politics [closely], but they see the same faces, the same issues," said Rep. Patrick Murphy (D-Fla.), a 31-year-old who just won his second term. "I think the first party to really wake up to that and change things, the quicker they are to adapt and put some younger, fresher folks out front, the better off the party will be as a whole."

Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee (D-Tex.), who begins her 20th year in office next year, agreed. "My message would be, use us all. Use us all. Spread us out. Provide leadership positions for those who want them and you will see a new day in the caucus."

Rep. Peter Welch (D-Vt.) said that Democrats don't have a leadership problem, but should have talked more about the economy: "The problem is we don't have an agenda that's resonating."

Rep. Gerald E. Connolly (D-Va.) said that Democrats "were allergic to talking about a robust economy."

Even Rep. Rosa L. DeLauro (D-Conn.), a Pelosi confidante who will co-chair the caucus's policy and steering committee, said that Democrats need a more aggressive national message focused on the economy "in the same way that the Republicans spent their money against Barack Obama day in and day out. They even had him responsible for the Ebola crisis. Come on, Christ, give me a break."

Pelosi said that the party faced unprecedented spending by Republicans and outside conservative groups that flooded swing districts and made it difficult for Democrats to defend seats and make gains.

"It was more expensive to advertise in Arkansas than it was in Los Angeles on TV, it was so fierce," she said.

Looking ahead, Pelosi on Monday tapped Rep. Ben Ray Luján (D-N.M.) to lead the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, putting him in charge of recruiting new candidates and winning back seats in 2016, when the presidential election should make it easier for Democrats to turn out supporters.

After two grueling election cycles that saw Democrats lose seats, Pelosi rewarded the outgoing DCCC chairman, Rep. Steve Israel (D-N.Y.), 56, with a new policy and communications position in hopes of streamlining the party message. DeLauro, 71, will share leadership of the caucus's powerful policy and steering committee with Rep. Donna Edwards (D-Md.), 56. The pair will help pick committee assignments for new members.

Pelosi called Luján "a focused operational person. He understands that getting out the vote is what this is and how we message to our base and how we message across the board to the persuadables and the rest."

Luján teared up and spoke in Spanish as he accepted the job at a press conference on Monday. He will be a much younger face alongside Pelosi, 74, Hoyer, 75, and Clyburn, 74.

He is the first Latino ever to hold the DCCC job. His father, Ben Luján, once served as speaker of the New Mexico House, and his cousin is Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-N.M.), another member of New Mexico's congressional delegation.

On Wednesday, Democrats are expected to settle a divisive race for one of the few choice assignments left: the party's top dog on the influential Energy and Commerce Committee.

Reps. Frank Pallone Jr. (D-N.J.) and Anna G. Eshoo (D-Calif.) have spent the past 10 months campaigning for the top job since the committee's current senior Democrats, Reps. Henry A. Waxman (Calif.) and John D. Dingell (Mich.), announced plans to retire.

The contest is an intriguing proxy fight between Pelosi and Hoyer. Pelosi is backing fellow Californian Eshoo; Hoyer is with Pallone.

Pelosi repeatedly referred to Eshoo as "the future" of her party - even though the women are separated by just three years in age. She also said that it would be helpful for another California Democrat to have a prominent role to raise campaign cash from west coast supporters and companies with business before the committee.

After all, Pelosi said, "I have a lot of other work to do."

Ben Ray Lujan chosen as next DCCC chairman

BYLINE: Ed O'Keefe

LENGTH: 731 words

This item has been updated.

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has selected Rep. Ben Ray Lujan (D-N.M.) to serve as the next chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, a plum assignment heading into a 2016 political cycle that is expected to be much more beneficial for Democrats.

Pelosi plans to make the decision official on Monday afternoon, but previewed her pick in an interview with The Washington Post, saying that Lujan "is really a focused operational person. He understands that getting out the vote is what this is and how we message to our base and how we message across the board to the persuadables and the rest."

"I'm choosing him because of his political astuteness, and he can manage all of this very well," she said during an interview in her office at the U.S. Capitol.

Pelosi is expected to be easily reelected as House minority leader when Democrats meet behind closed doors on Tuesday morning to begin their leadership elections for the next Congress. Her lieutenants, Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) and Rep. James Clyburn (D-S.C.) also are expected to win another term atop the caucus.

Lujan, 42, will be a fresh and much younger face among top House Democrats. Lujan, who will be the first Latino ever to hold the job of party campaign chairman, begins his fourth term in Congress in January. He is a member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee and a vice chairman with the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, leading the group's political action committee with a focus on helping more Latinos win seats in Congress.

The congressman's father, Ben Lujan, once served as speaker of the New Mexico House of Representatives and his cousin is Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-N.M.), another member of New Mexico's congressional delegation.

Pelosi also detailed plans Monday to fill out her leadership team. She will give outgoing DCCC chairman, Rep. Steve Israel (D-N.Y.), the newly created position of chairman of policy and communications -- essentially a leading messaging role for the caucus. Israel has led the DCCC through the last two political cycles, during which the party failed to retake the majority, losing at least eight seats this year.

Two loyal Pelosi allies, Reps. Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.) and Donna Edwards (D-Md.), will be tapped to serve as co-chairmen of the caucus's policy and steering committee. The influential roles give longtime Pelosi friend DeLauro and Edwards, who is considered a rising star and potentially future statewide candidate in Maryland, the job of determining which party members will serve on key committees next year.

Lujan is a dark-horse candidate to lead the DCCC, someone who's name hadn't been floated publicly in recent days. Other names mentioned included Rep. Joseph Kennedy III (D-Mass.), who asked that his name be withdrawn from consideration. Others included Rep. Jim Himes (D-Conn.), who served as the committee's finance chairman for the past two years, and Rep. Joaquin Castro (D-Tex.), a freshman member whose brother, Julian Castro, is serving as secretary of Housing and Urban Development.

Pelosi called Himes "a wonderful person" who did "better than anybody" in assuring that Democrats gave money to the DCCC for the election cycle. She met with Castro last Thursday about the role, but disputed news reports that she was on the verge of picking him.

"I read about it in the paper. Or not in the paper - but people were calling me saying 'I hear you're going to announce Joaquin.' I've never had a conversation with Joaquin about this, he's never told me he's interested," she said.

She said she spoke with and selected Lujan "in the last few days."

During the interview, Pelosi said that she has no plans to relinquish her leadership position until Democrats retake control of the House.

"I could have walked away, but we built something and then we want to take it to the next step," she said.

Asked what happens when Democrats get to that next step, she said: "We win."

And will she stay in her role if that happens?

"I don't know," she said. "It depends on what members want. But I thought I'd be long gone by now."

"I thought we'd win the third term in the majority and I would have completed some of the work. I'm not here because I want to have the accoutrement of being leader. I'm here because we have a mission to accomplish for the American people," she said.

In a surprise, Ben Ray Lujan to lead DCCC

LENGTH: 467 words

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, a New Mexico Democrat, will serve as the next chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee following a surprise announcement from House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi today.

Pelosi first dropped the news in an interview with the Washington Post's Ed O'Keefe Monday afternoon and then made it official at a Capitol Hill news conference at about 2:45 Mountain time. Lujan, who just won election to a fourth term, will become the second Hispanic chairman of the House Democrats' primary political arm.

"I am pleased to recommend to our colleagues Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico, a dynamic and forward-looking leader with a fresh energy and ideas that Democrats need for victory in 2016," Pelosi said at the news conference. "He has bold vision and determined leadership to deliver wins in difficult districts. I am confident (Lujan) will prove a tireless champion."

The DCCC chairmanship is a high-profile plum assignment for Lujan heading into a 2016 political cycle. But after a bruising election for House Democrats in 2014, Lujan has a steep climb ahead. House Democrats need to pick up about 30 seats to capture control of the House. Some of the 2014 race outcomes are not yet decided.

Larry Sabato, chairman of the Institute for Politics at the University of Virginia and one of the nation's best handicappers of House and Senate races, told me Lujan - while a surprise pick - has some qualities that can be helpful to the Democrats. Sabato also said he has his work cut out for him

"Lujan is a Westerner, Hispanic, and young and energetic," Sabato said. "That last quality will be critical as he attempts to climb Mt. Everest and somehow restore Democrats to the House majority. More realistically, he'll want to try to get Democrats back over the 200-member mark after 2016 so that they can be in the game. Right now, House Democrats are by far the least relevant caucus in either house of Congress."

Lujan, beaming and sounding confident in his new role, told those attending the press conference that he was late because he "couldn't get my mom off the phone."

Lujan told me in an interview in September that he had designs on the chairmanship of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus - an influential Capitol Hill group he has been climbing the ranks of - but he made no mention of a possible DCCC chairmanship. The Post called Lujan a "dark horse" candidate "who's name hadn't been floated publicly in recent days."

"I'm choosing him because of his political astuteness, and he can manage all of this very well," Pelosi told the Post.

Pelosi said she would stay on board as minority leader. Lujan takes over the DCCC role from Rep. Steve Israel, whose performance was underwhelming in the last election cycle, based on the results.

We'll have more in tomorrow's paper.

Luján named head of DCCC

BYLINE: Michael Coleman, JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: INSIDE THE BELTWAY

LENGTH: 997 words

WASHINGTON - Rep. Ben Ray Luján, a New Mexico Democrat, saw his national political profile elevated dramatically Monday when House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi made a surprise announcement naming him chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

In his new role, Luján will take control of the U.S. House Democrats' election strategy and become a key member of the House Democratic leadership structure. The announcement came as a shock on Capitol Hill, as several more senior members' names had been floated for the position in recent days. Luján will become just the second Latino to hold the post. Former Rep. Tony Coelho of California, who was a member of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, headed the committee in the 1980s.

"I am pleased recommend to our colleagues Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico, a dynamic and forward-looking leader with a fresh energy and ideas that Democrats need for victory in 2016," Pelosi said at a Capitol Hill news conference to announce the pick. "He has bold vision and determined leadership to deliver wins in difficult districts. I am confident (Luján) will prove a tireless champion."

A beaming Luján - son of the late New Mexico House Speaker Ben Lujan - apologized for being tardy to the news conference, saying he couldn't get off the phone with his mother, " who was "joyous" about the news.

"It got a little emotional," Luján told the Journal afterward, saying his mother told him his late father would have been proud of him. "We shared some tears and shared some laughs."

While the DCCC chairmanship is a high-profile, plum assignment for Luján, he faces a steep climb heading into the 2016 political cycle. House Democrats were drubbed in congressional elections this month, and Republicans now control both chambers of Congress. Democrats would have to pick up about 30 seats to capture control of the House.

At the news conference, Luján said he was up to the challenge.

"House Republicans are once again talking about shutting down the government rather than working with Democrats and the president to tackle the issues facing families across our nation," Luján said. "I will work to make sure House Republicans are held accountable for this reckless behavior and that the American people see the clear difference between House Democrats (and Republicans). There will be great opportunities in 2016 to make gains with the more favorable electorate during the presidential year. We will be on the offensive to put the majority in play."

While Democrats were congratulating Luján on Capitol Hill, officials at the National Republican Congressional Committee - the DCCC's counterpart - appeared pleased with the selection, as well - but for different reasons. Ian Prior, spokesman for the NRCC, said Luján is among the most liberal members of the House and his politics will fall flat with many Americans.

"In selecting Ben Luján to head the DCCC, Nancy Pelosi has chosen a member of the uber-liberal House Progressive Caucus who has routinely voted for budgets that include amnesty for illegal immigrants, tax rates as high as 49%, and a massive expansion of Obamacare," Prior said. "This pick will give rise to plenty of awkward moments on the 2016 campaign trail as Democrats in swing states will have to distance themselves from incoming Chairman Luján, the very person tasked with helping them get elected."

Larry Sabato, chairman of the Center for Politics at the University of Virginia and one of the nation's best handicappers of House and Senate races, said Luján - while a surprise pick - has some qualities that can be helpful to the Democrats. Sabato also said he has his work cut out for him.

"Luján is a Westerner, Hispanic, and young and energetic," Sabato said. "That last quality will be critical as he attempts to climb Mount Everest and somehow restore Democrats to the House majority. More realistically, he'll want to try to get Democrats back over the 200-member mark after 2016 so that they can be in the game. Right now, House Democrats are by far the least relevant caucus in either house of Congress."

"House Republicans are once again talking about shutting down the government rather than working with Democrats and the president to tackle the issues facing families across our nation," Luján said. "I will work to make sure House Republicans are held accountable for this reckless behavior and that the American people see the clear difference between House Democrats [and Republicans]. There will be great opportunities in 2016 to make gains with the more favorable electorate during the presidential year. We will be on the offensive to put the majority in play."

Luján has proved a popular member of the Democratic House caucus and most recently served as vice chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. Lujan's Democratic congressional colleagues from New Mexico praised his appointment.

"Congressman Luján has been a dynamic leader in the Hispanic Caucus and in New Mexico," said Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham. "He will build on that leadership for the Democratic Party and will engage key constituencies to build a path to the majority for Democrats in Congress. During his time in Congress, Congressman Luján has been a strong advocate for working families and the middle class. I fully support him as the messenger for Democratic priorities and I look forward to working with him to achieve those goals."

"Ben Ray has shown strong leadership in the House and is greatly respected by his colleagues. I can't think of anyone better-suited for this important post," said Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M.

"Congressman Luján's incredible enthusiasm, intelligence and leadership have made him an effective congressman for New Mexico and a great partner in Washington," said Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M. "Having Congressman Luján in the House leadership will help shine a light on issues that matter to New Mexicans, from immigration to rural development to clean energy. I am extremely proud of him today."

New Mexico Dem tapped to head campaign committee

SECTION: WASHINGTON DATELINE; POLITICAL NEWS

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON (AP) - House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi announced Monday that she had tapped Rep. Ben Ray Lujan to head the campaign committee and try to get the party back on track after a drubbing in midterm elections.

The 42-year-old Lujan, who would be the first Hispanic to hold the post, will succeed New York Rep. Steve Israel as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee.

The midterms of President Barack Obama's second term were widely expected to be tough for Democrats, but the party had an even tougher going as Republicans claimed a commanding majority and captured seats in typically favorable states such as New York, Illinois and Maine.

Democrats lost at least a dozen seats and Republicans should hold 246 in the next Congress, the most in nearly 70 years.

Lujan told reporters at a news conference that the 2016 presidential election year should be more favorable.

"We will be on the offensive to put the majority in play," he said.

Despite their strength at an historic low, Democrats plan to stand pat with their leadership at elections on Tuesday. Democrats are expected to re-elect the 14-term Pelosi as leader and 17-term Rep. Steny Hoyer of Maryland for the No. 2 job.

In addition to Lujan, Pelosi is recommending that Israel serve as chairman of policy and communications, crafting a message for the party; Rep. Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut to be the Steering Committee co-chairman and Rep. Donna Edwards of Maryland to be policy co-chair.

The Democratic caucus is expected to approve the slate.

Lujan told reporters Monday that he wants to "take lessons from the recent elections and get right to work."

Lujan is well-versed in politics. His father Ben was the former state House speaker in New Mexico.

Pelosi picks Lujan to helm DCCC

BYLINE: By Eric Bradner, CNN

LENGTH: 172 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON (CNN)

WASHINGTON (CNN) -- House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi is tapping a fresh face -- 42-year-old Latino Rep. Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico -- to replace Rep. Steve Israel of New York at the helm of the party's campaign efforts.

Israel chaired the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee during the 2012 and 2014 elections but had said in the wake of this year's Republican victories that he wouldn't seek a third term in that role.

Lujan, a former state utility regulator who was first elected to Congress in 2008, is set to start his fourth term representing a congressional district that includes Santa Fe.

Pelosi tweeted the news of Lujan's selection Monday.

Lujan is one of the Democratic caucuses younger members, a group that has faced pressure to bring newer members to the leadership table. Lujan will face a tall task: After a drubbing in the 2014 midterms, Democrats have just 186 House seats to the GOP's 244, with five races still undecided.

Pelosi Chooses Ben Ray Luján as DCCC Chairman (Updated)

BYLINE: By Emma Dumain and Abby Livingston

LENGTH: 372 words

Updated 4:47 p.m. | In a shock to her caucus, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi selected Rep. Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee for the 2016 cycle.

Luján will lead his caucus' political arm and all aspects of the campaign to take back the gavel: fundraising, messaging, recruiting and getting out the vote.

The choice is Pelosi's lone decision, but it was a total shock to most Democrats on Capitol Hill.

"I am pleased recommend to our colleagues Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico, a dynamic and forward-looking leader with a fresh energy and ideas that demcorats need for victory in 2016," Pelosi said in a Monday news conference. "He has bold vision and determined leaership to deliver wins in difficult districts. I am confident [he] will prove a tireless champion."

Luján is not the first Hispanic to lead the committee. Rep. Tony Coelho of California ran the committee for three terms in the 1980s.

Running the DCCC will be a herculean task after the midterm elections translated into House Democrats' smallest caucus in modern history.

House Democrats will need to win around 30 seats in order to capture the gavel back for the party. Some of the 2014 race outcomes are still pending.

As for Luján, he apologized for tardiness to the press conference because "I couldn't get Mom off the phone."

On a serious note, he said there are "great opportunities in 2016 to make gains with the more favorable electorate during a presidential year."

Reps. Donna Edwards of Maryland, Jim Himes of Connecticut, Jared Polis of Colorado and Joaquin Castro of Texas were previously believed to have the inside track for the job.

Pelosi first confirmed the news to The Washington Post in an interview. She tweeted the announcement as well.

With New House Democratic Leadership Team, Pelosi Looks Out for Her Own

BYLINE: By Emma Dumain

LENGTH: 614 words

At a surprise press conference Monday, Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi introduced the appointed members of a reconfigured leadership team.

The California Democrat's top lieutenants in the 114th Congress will overwhelmingly include familiar faces in new roles, a signal that she will continue a practice of rewarding and empowering her allies as needs shift within the caucus.

A clear sign of that tradition comes with the re-appointment of Rep. Rosa DeLauro, D-Conn., as co-chairwoman of the Democratic Steering and Policy Committee.

At one point, Steering and Policy leadership positions were supposed to come with term limits, but DeLauro has kept her seat at the table for years past her would-be expiration date. Pelosi described DeLauro, a close friend, as a "lioness" and "an institution" who will stay at Steering and Policy "by popular demand."

With DeLauro's longtime co-chairman George Miller, D-Calif., retiring this year, Pelosi has given his job to Rep. Donna Edwards, D-Md. She was most recently the leader of the House Democratic women's working group, where she touted priorities close to Pelosi's heart.

Edwards also was at one point considered a front-runner for chairwoman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee; Pelosi announced Monday that Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., would be the chairman of the DCCC for the next cycle - and one of the few truly new faces in House Democratic leadership in the next Congress.

Pelosi's real power play on Monday was in creating an entirely new position for outgoing DCCC Chairman Steve Israel, D-N.Y., who up until Monday afternoon was a man without a home in leadership. In the new House Democratic power structure, he will serve under the title "chairman of policy and communications."

"Congressman Israel will be an invaluable asset to our caucus, working closely with the Steering and Policy Committee to develop our caucus message, jump start the middle class and reignite the American dream," said Pelosi, who four years ago made sure that Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., newly finished with his tour of duty leading the DCCC, got to be a de facto member of leadership as ranking member on Budget.

Earlier on Monday - before Luján's appointment and Pelosi's press conference - Israel sent fellow House Democrats a memo outlining the gains and shortfalls of the 2014 election cycle that read as a defense of his own leadership at the DCCC. Members are privately, and not-so-privately, grumbling about what went wrong on Election Day so that House Republicans now have the largest majority in almost a century.

Meanwhile, in elevating Luján to lead the DCCC, Pelosi cleared the way for another California Democrat - who, incidentally, is also a favorite of the minority leader - to move up into a leadership post.

Luján was poised to be the chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus in the 114th Congress, but told CQ Roll Call on Monday that he would no longer be running for the position. Next in line is Rep. Linda T. Sanchez, D-Calif., whom Pelosi has previously tapped to be the ranking member of the Ethics Committee and one of the five Democrats on the special Benghazi investigative panel.

An aide close to Sanchez said that she was exploring her options, while Luján said he would endorse her for the position.

Hispanic Caucus elections are on Tuesday, as are elections for minority leader, minority whip, assistant leader and caucus chairman and vice-chairman.

Abby Livingston contributed to this report.

Pelosi Announces House Democratic Leadership Changes

Washington, D.C. - Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi released the following statement today regarding her recommendations for House Democratic Leadership positions:

"The Chairman of the Democratic Caucus has informed Members that we will meet tomorrow to organize the Caucus and elect the Leadership team for the 114th Congress.

"Should I receive the honor of serving as House Democratic Leader, I will make the following recommendations to my colleagues in the caucus: Congressman Ben Ray Lujan as Chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, Congressman Steve Israel of New York to be Chair, Policy and Communications, Congresswoman Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut as Steering Co-Chair and Congresswoman Donna Edwards of Maryland as Policy Co-Chair.

"Congressman Ben Ray Lujan is a dynamic and forward-looking leader with the fresh energy and ideas House Democrats need for victory in 2016. Congressman Lujan has the bold vision and determined leadership to deliver Democratic wins in difficult districts - and I am confident he will prove a tireless champion for our members and candidates across the country.

"As Chairman of the DCCC for the past four years, Congressman Steve Israel has consistently proved the depth of his wisdom and the strength of his strategic vision in making our case to the American people. In his new role as Chair, Policy and Communications, Congressman Israel will be an invaluable asset to our Caucus, working closely with the Steering and Policy Committee to develop our Caucus message, jumpstart the middle class and reignite the American dream.

"Rosa DeLauro's innovative and unrelenting leadership is essential to our Caucus. She is the insistent vision behind the When Women Succeed, America Succeeds agenda, and her work on behalf of students and working families is unparalleled. Congresswoman DeLauro is the lion of our caucus, and I look forward to continuing to work with her to move our country forward.

"Congresswoman Donna Edwards has been an energetic and impassioned voice within our Caucus ever since she came to Congress. As Chair of the Democratic Women's Working Group, she has been a forceful champion of America's women - continuing the work she began as co-founder and executive director of the National Network to End Domestic Violence. Congresswoman Edwards' deep grasp of policy and the priorities of middle class families will make her a great asset to our caucus in the role of Policy Co-Chair."

PELOSI: Good afternoon, everyone. The chairman of the -- hi.

(LAUGHTER)

PELOSI: Hi. The chairman of the House Democratic Caucus has informed members that tomorrow we will elect the leadership team for the 114th Congress. Should I receive the honor of serving as the House Democratic leader, I will be proud to recommend members gathered here for important positions of leadership in our caucus in the new Congress.

As the next chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, I'm pleased to recommend to our colleagues Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico, a dynamic and forward-looking leader with a fresh energy and ideas House Democrats need for victory in 2016.

He has bold vision and determined leadership to deliver wins in difficult districts. I am confident that Congressman Lujan will prove a tireless champion for our members and candidates across the country, and I'm absolutely delighted to recommend him to the caucus.

As chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee for the past few years -- four years, Congressman Steve Israel has consistently proved the depth of his wisdom and the strength of his strategic vision in making the -- our case to the American people. In his new role -- and we thank him for his leadership over those four years.

In his new role as chair of something called Policy and Communications, Congressman Israel will be an invaluable asset to our caucus working closely with the Steering and Policy Committee to develop our caucus message, jump start the middle class, and to reignite the American dream. Thank you, Mr. Israel, for agreeing to serve.

Congresswoman Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut, her innovative and unrelenting leadership -- unrelenting -- unrelenting leadership is essential to our caucus. She is what I call the godmother When Women Succeed, America Succeeds agenda.

Her work on behalf of students and working families is unparalleled. Congresswoman DeLauro is a lioness of our caucus, and I look forward to continuing to work with her as co-chair of the Steering and Policy Committee.

I have to say about Rosa, the 40-some members that are here from the freshman class of last year -- we had 51, I think it's now 45 -- they have entrusted their hopes, dreams, aspirations and their career path to Rosa, and she understands their aspiration as well as even more -- senior members.

So she is an institution that everyone by popular demand insisted that she again serve in this role. It pleased all of us. I'm glad it pleased Rosa to do that.

Congresswoman Donna Edwards of Maryland has been an energetic and impassioned voice within our caucus since she came to caucus. As chair of the Democratic Women's Working Group, she has been a forceful champion for America's women, continuing to work as she began as co- founder and executive director of the National Network to End Domestic Violence.

Congresswoman Edwards' deep grasp of policy and priorities of middle-class families will make her a great asset to our caucus in the role of policy co-chair. These members are tested and tenacious members of our caucus. They have the energy and the vision to win progress for the American people. I'm excited to work with them in these important roles.

And I'm very pleased and honored to yield to my nominee to be chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, Ben Ray -- Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico.

LUJAN: Thank you, Leader Pelosi. And I want to apologize for everyone for keeping everyone waiting. It was me that caused the delay. I shared with Speaker Pelosi as I was walking in that I couldn't get mom off the phone. And as I was visiting with mom to visit with her, you can imagine it was emotional. It was joyous.

My father, who passed away two years ago, was the former speaker of the New Mexico House of Representatives and was actively involved fro a grassroots perspective in organizing leaders and making sure that we were looking after the working people of America. So I want to apologize for the press ahead of time for that delay as well.

I want to thank Leader Pelosi for the opportunity and commend her and Chairman Israel for their leadership. I've been working with the chairman as part of the Latino Council and saw the tremendous job he did in recruiting at the DCCC and in growing in a historically challenging cycle.

I look forward to working with him in the coming days so that I can hit the ground running, take lessons from the recent elections, and get right to work to ensure that we have the great candidates, resource and messages to begin a successful 2016. I know that Chairman Israel has already been recruiting, working actively as he always has from day one, and I look forward to that same work ethic going forward.

Already less than a month removed from the elections, House Republicans are once again talking about shutting down the government rather than working with Democrats and the president to tackle the issue facing families across our nation. They've stood in the way of increasing the minimum wage, equal pay for equal work and comprehensive immigration reform.

As the chair of the DCCC, I will work to make sure that House Republicans are held accountable for this reckless behavior and that the American people see the clear difference between House Democrats, who have a plan for job creation, make college more affordable, raise the minimum wage and fix our broken immigration system.

There will be great opportunities in 2016 to make gains with the more favorable electorate during a presidential year. And with many districts held by Republicans that President Obama won, we will be on the offensive to put the majority in place.

Again, thank you Leader Pelosi, and I look forward to getting to work.

PELOSI: Thank you very much, Chairman Lujan. It is with my -- with great appreciation and admiration for a job well done that I now yield to the new chair of Communications and Policy, Congressman Steve Israel of New York, really of the whole country. He travels so much.

ISRAEL: Thank you, Leader. Thank you. Now if you think that Ben Ray is happy, you have no idea how happy I am.

PELOSI: Even happier than his mom?

ISRAEL: This may be the happiest day in my life. I am -- I'm incredibly excited by Leader Pelosi's decision to reorganize the leadership of our caucus and create a position as chairman of Policy and Communications.

Leader Pelosi and I have talked about this extensively. I'm going to be very brief, and then I'm going to brag on -- on my friend Ben Ray. Our country is experiencing the deepest and the most acute anxiety for the middle class in history.

In the past election, one third of the eligible voters voted for a Democrat or a Republican. Two thirds of voters stayed home because they've lost faith in government's ability to understand their anxiety and solve their economic challenges.

In fact, if you take a look at the past several elections, voters have us all on a very short leash. They give a majority and they take it away very quickly literally every few years because of this intense economic anxiety that they have.

And it's understandable. Since the recovery began, the economy's grown 12 percent. Corporate profits have grown 46 percent. The stock market has grown 92 percent, but median household income has declined by 3 percent. So no wonder they're anxious. No wonder they feel this insecurity.

Now voters on both -- both parties have -- voter have put both parties on a short leash, but intuitively they know that Democrats have always been the party of the middle class and working families and will continue to be the party of the middle class and working families.

And this new position within the Democratic leadership will bring our messaging and our policies, particularly on middle-class anxieties, to a new and never before seen level for our caucus.

And I look forward to working with Leader Pelosi, working closely with Steering and Policy, working with every member of our caucus to project and amplify and focus intensely on that message that we are the party of the middle class and we are the party of middle-class security and opportunity.

Leader Pelosi wants to proactively create a middle-class movement that focuses on wage growth in the middle class, that focuses on new opportunities. And that's precisely what this new effort will do, and precisely what the leader has asked me to focus on in terms of policy and communications.

Now, a final word about Ben Ray Lujan. I shared the D triple C for four years. And I must tell you that I can't think of a group of members more operational, more committed, more devoted, more dedicated than Donna Edwards, who did our recruiting, and Ben Ray Lujan, who, when given a mission, just did the mission. No drama, no excitement. Just achieved the goal. Both Donna and Ben Ray were just incredibly positive and operational. I'm very grateful to both of them. And I look forward to supporting Donna in her new position as co-chair Steering and Policy, and supporting Ben Ray in his new position as chair of the D triple C. So, thank you, Leader Pelosi, for giving me this opportunity and allowing me to continue my work for the D triple C with Ben ray.

Thank you.

PELOSI: Thank you very much, Chairman Israel. I don't know when this takes effect. I guess when the members vote tomorrow. After we -- after we have our own elections. And since I don't have an opponent, there -- a possibility that I might get elected, but we'll see tomorrow. And then we take these recommendations to the caucus. And one of the -- the election of Steering and Policy chairs, though, is it is a function of the Steering and Policy Committee.

The Steering piece is that, you know -- or the committee assignments, et cetera -- the policy piece is just as it says. And Rosa DeLauro is an expert on both. As I said, by popular demand of the members, she is back in that position as the leader on policy in our caucus. Since she came to the Congress, we have learned a lot from her, and continue to do so as co-chair of Steering and Policy.

Thank you.

. DELAURO: Thank you very, very much. And it's a really exciting day. And I want to say thank you to you, Madam Leader, and for your continued trust in me, and the continued trust of -- of my colleagues. It's -- as you mentioned, that is heartwarming. Because you're always -- it's always more difficult with your peers. You want to make sure that they're -- they're standing with you.

I'm delighted to serve again as co-chair of Steering and Policy for another two years, and so looking forward to working with -- with a partner here with Congresswoman Donna Edwards. And we have worked together over the last couple of years, particularly on issues that are affecting both working women and working men in our community.

And also pleased to work with the Steering and Policy Committee as we address the pressing issues that face the American people.

Democrats have an important mission in the next two years. We need to stand up for the middle class. We need to stand up for the working poor, and for the vulnerable. And the important economic issues of the day -- the most important challenge for people today is that they're in jobs that don't pay them enough money to live on. The leader understands that to (inaudible). And, quite frankly, there's no one better able to lead us as we face those economic challenges. And that's what we need to do for the middle class and for working men and women in this nation. And that is, is to look at the kinds of -- how we create jobs, how we look at increasing that minimum wage, how we look at rebuilding this country through infrastructure and creating jobs that cannot be outsourced. How we pay attention to education and the cost of -- of allowing people to go to school again in -- in this nation.

Today we know that student loan debt is larger than credit card debt. Big issues that we need to face. And, as I said, that the -- the leader understands that better than anyone. She has a clear vision. She has a progressive vision. She listens, she understands, and she brings together the interests of a very diverse caucus. It's not homogeneous. I don't have to tell you about a Democratic Caucus. And leading us is -- is a task that she takes on, and she really demonstrates to the caucus her strength. And by doing that, provides strength to where we want to try to go.

So, I am proud to serve in the leadership with Leader Pelosi, with the rest of my colleagues here, and I'm proud to be a part of what is a very, very strong team. And I would just say to the folks out there, don't underestimate us.

(LAUGHTER)

PELOSI: Wow. Thank you, Rosa, for your ongoing leadership and your strong message.

We have a newcomer to the leadership in the House Democratic Caucus -- not a newcomer to being a leader, though, as chair of the Democratic Women's Working Group, she led us around the country on a bus. When women succeed, America succeeds. She leads us with her deep values, her political astuteness, her knowledge of the issues. She's going to be just a wonderful addition to the leadership as she chairs -- co-chairs with Rosa the Steering and Policy Committee.

Congresswoman Donna Edwards of Maryland.

EDWARDS: Thank you, Madam Leader.

And I have to tell you, I am so blown away just to be standing here today as part of this new and refreshing leadership team. And I cannot thank the leader enough for displaying the confidence in me and my colleagues to put our foot forward for the 21st century for working people in this country.

And I want to say a couple of thank yous in addition to the leader. It has been a real privilege to work with Steve Israel, our outgoing chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, in recruiting a caliber class of candidates and making sure that we had the resources that we need to do the job.

And now we have the great privilege of being able to stand alongside, work with and for my good friend, Ben Ray Lujan. I cannot say enough about him. He truly is a leader. He has demonstrated that since day one that he came into the Congress. And I'm looking forward to the work that we're going to do together to do, as he's described, and that is put forward both an agenda for the American people and for working people that says, "We know who you are; we're invested in you; and we want you to be invested in us."

And I know that our soon-to-be chairman, Ben Ray Lujan, is doing to do that for us. And I look forward to supporting him in that effort.

And what can I say about my colleague, Rosa DeLauro? She is such a champion and has such energy. And I only hope I can match that energy on the Steering and Policy Committee.

PELOSI: You're not Italian, you see, and that's...

(CROSSTALK)

EDWARDS: That's right. I'm not. And so I have work to do, but I'm looking forward to doing it.

(LAUGHTER)

And, you know, I think that this is a really exciting day for our Democratic Caucus. Tomorrow will be more exciting when we cement it. But I think what you have standing before you is a leadership team that is interested in the future. And it's really committed every single bit of the way to making sure that working families understand that we are on their side; that we know that there is a struggle; that we know that they haven't had a raise in a very, very long time; that we know that every day they just want to get up and take care of themselves and their families, build a better life for their -- for their children.

And we have the responsibility of making sure that those dreams come true and that those opportunities are created, and that there are indeed ladders of opportunity for success for the American people. And I am looking forward to doing this.

So Rosa, I'm with you.

(LAUGHTER)

PELOSI: Thank you. Thank you very much, Congresswoman. Thank you all.

Tomorrow after our election, which will take place in the morning, our full leadership team will come forward to make our presentation and to answer your questions.

I just want to close by saying the following. Now, the Republicans have taken both Houses of the Congress of the United States. But when we did that in 2006 (inaudible) elect -- a Congress sworn in in 2007, we worked with President Bush on so many issues. We passed one of the biggest energy bills in the history of our country. We worked with him on a stimulus package. Rosa was very instrumental in helping as we did stimulus and the rebates, that they were refundable to low-income families.

Barney Frank said it was one of the most progressive pieces of legislation to come out of the Congress. We did that with President Bush. And of course, we worked with him on TARP when his own party abandoned him on that, but we were there. Just to name a few examples.

We opposed him on the war in Iraq and privatizing Social Security, but that did not have an influence on how we worked with him on other issues.

So I want the record to show that we did cooperate with President Bush, and I hope the record will soon show that the newly elected Republican Congress will work constructively with President Obama.

We -- we want to work with them to make progress for the American people. A couple of years ago it was building ladders of opportunity for everyone who wants to work hard and play by the rules to achieve the American dream, to reignite the American dream.

This past year, it was jump starting the middle class, creating good-paying jobs here in the United States by building infrastructure of our country, making college affordable, and When Women Succeed, American Succeeds with equal pay for equal work.

These are things that I think have a nonpartisan nature to them. They are supported by the American people. We have to communicate it in a stronger way. But hopefully we can do -- act upon all of that in a bipartisan way as go we go forward.

So I congratulate our leadership team. Part of the House Democratic leadership tomorrow will all be coming out of the caucus with the results of those elections and with an expanded opportunity for you to question our members then. But right now if you have questions -- yes?

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) just managing expectations. Republicans have built their largest majority since at least the Truman administration, possibly even the Hoover administration if they can pick up one more seat from these outstanding races.

Where do you manage expectations, and is it a realistic goal to try to (inaudible) back a majority?

LUJAN: Look, as Steve pointed out, as Chairman Israel pointed out, we -- we saw so many of the American people that didn't come out to vote this year.

As we're celebrating and remembering the 50th year of the Voting Rights Act and we're continuing to see Republicans try to chip away at that, I think it's important that we just go talk to more and more people.

And I think we can -- we can set those expectations high. Going into 2016, we're going to see more of the electorate involved, excited, ready to work, and get ready to get more people elected. And so I think that, again, working closely with Steve and with the team, we'll see those numbers as they roll out.

But you saw those very close elections this year where Republicans spent a record amount of money. I think we're going to see more Democrats get elected in 2016 and those numbers are going to surprise you.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) some things the way that most Republicans appear to see this issue. How do you see that playing out in the near term? I know two years is a long way away here, but how do you see that playing out in the Latino community as this fight will probably emerge maybe even in just the next few days here (inaudible)?

LUJAN: Chad (ph), the Republicans have been selling comprehensive immigration reform for over two years now. They've had a chance to put a bill up to vote. Speaker Boehner has stalled that. If Republicans in the House and the Senate aren't happy with actions that the president will consider -- and we'll see what those look like going forward -- they -- they're in charge. They can put a bill forward.

And I certainly hope that we can come together and work that way. I don't believe this is going to poison the well. This should encourage everyone to work together, and I'm certainly hopeful that we'll see more of that.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) and a lot of that seemed directly (inaudible) positions on leave for women who have (inaudible). Could you respond to some of that criticism (ph)?

PELOSI: Sure. First of all, let me say that we do have -- I was one of the ones who said to Congresswoman Duckworth, don't come back here. This is the most glorious experience of your life. The center of the universe will change for you when you have this precious new baby.

The rules of the caucus are the same as the rules of the House, no proxy voting, and would require changing rules of the caucus to -- as opposed to -- as different from the rules of the House. She understood that full well.

The fact is is that it's really important to be here, to be in caucus. It's more important to vote on the floor. If I were to make a fight, I'd vote to have a proxy to vote on the floor than in whatever's going on in the caucus.

But the fact is is that we don't know what's going on in the lives of many people. I think one of our members may be having an operation this week or that. You're going to establish a situation where we're going to determine who has a note from the doctor that's valid.

It's really a place we shouldn't go down, but it is not to be confused with not having family and medical leave. We wish her well. She's a heroine to our country. We're very excited about the baby. And in fact, knowing about the baby, I appointed Congresswoman Duckworth to the Benghazi committee. Only five appointments did I have. I wanted our strongest members there.

She informed me of her good news, and I said just take it as it comes. You know, to the extent that you can serve, we want you to be there. So I don't know why all this fuss was made about a vote in the caucus. I think if -- if the House wants to change its rules about proxies in general that applies to the floor and the caucus, that's -- that's another thing.

But we wish her well. She has all of our good wishes and prayers. And I had a very lovely conversation with her. But even again knowing that (inaudible) beautiful expectation very early on, I said we need your best -- our best thinking there. We need you to be there on the Benghazi committee.

I just want to ask Ben Ray Lujan if he would speak to his mom.

LUJAN: (SPEAKING IN SPANISH)

PELOSI: Thank you all.

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan named new DCCC chairman

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi announced Monday she has picked Rep. Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico as the new chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, the fundraising and candidate-recruiting arm of House Democrats.

Lujan, who has served in the House since 2009, replaces Rep. Steve Israel of New York, who oversaw massive losses for House Democrats during the 2012 and 2014 elections.

Pelosi, who is expected to be re-elected minority leader by House Democrats later this week, called Lujan "a dynamic and forward- looking leader with a fresh energy and ideas House Democrats need for victory in 2016."

Lujan has his work cut out for him. House Democrats so far have suffered a net loss of 15 seats as a result of the Nov. 4 midterm elections -- with a handful of races still undecided -- after losing 12 seats in 2012. Republicans are set to begin the 114th Congress in January with the largest House majority since at least the 1950s.

Lujan, who will be the first Hispanic to lead the DCCC, wouldn't say if it was realistic to expect Democrats will win back the House in 2016. But he suggested the political landscape will be more favorable for his party in two years than it has been in recent congressional election cycles.

"I think it's important we just go talk to more and more people, and I think we can set those expectations high," he told reporters during a news event at the Capitol. "Going into 2016, we're going to see more of the electorate involved, excited, ready to work and ready to get more [Democrats] elected."

"We'll see those numbers [for the 2016 elections] as they roll out. But you saw those very close elections this year where Republicans spent a record amount of money. I think we're going to see more Democrats get elected in 2016, and those numbers are going to surprise you."

Pelosi also announced Reps. Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut and Donna Edwards of Maryland as co-chairs of the Democratic Steering and Policy Committee.

The minority leader also created a new leadership position for Israel; chairman of policy and communications.

"As Chairman of the DCCC for the past four years, Congressman Steve Israel has consistently proved the depth of his wisdom and the strength of his strategic vision in making our case to the American people," she said. "Congressman Israel will be an invaluable asset to our caucus."

The leadership positions won't be official until the full House Democratic Caucus votes on them later this week. But the vote is viewed as a formality.

I chaired the DCCC for four years, and I must tell you that I can't think of a group of members more operational, more committed, more devoted, more dedicated than Donna Edwards, who did our recruiting, and Ben Ray Lujan, who, when given a mission, just did the mission -- no drama, no excitement, just achieved the goal. Both Donna and Ben Ray were just incredibly positive and operational. I'm very grateful to both of them and I look forward to supporting Donna in her new position as a co-chair, Steering and Policy, and supporting Ben Ray in his new position as chair of the DCCC.

So thank you, Leader Pelosi, for giving me this opportunity and allowing me to continue my work for the DCCC with Ben Ray. Thank you.

REP. PELOSI: Thank you very much, Chairman Israel.

I don't know when this takes effect, I guess when the members vote tomorrow -- (laughter) -- after we have our own elections. And since I don't have an opponent, there's a possibility that I might get elected, but we'll see tomorrow. And then we take these recommendations to the caucus.

And one of the -- the election of Steering and Policy chairs, though, is a function of the Steering and Policy Committee. The steering piece is, you know, the committee assignments, et cetera. The policy piece is just as it says, and Rosa DeLauro is an expert on both. As I said, by popular demand of the members she is back in that position as a leader on policy in our caucus. Since she came to the Congress we had learned a lot from her and continue to do so as co-chair of Steering and Policy.

REPRESENTATIVE ROSA DELAURO (D-CT): Thank you, Madam Leader.

REP. PELOSI: Thank you.

REP. DELAURO: Thank you very, very much. And it's a really exciting day, and I want to say thank you to you, Madam Leader, and for your continued trust in me and the continued trust of my colleagues, as you mentioned. That is heartwarming because you always -- it's always more difficult with your peers. You want to make sure that they're standing with you.

I'm delighted to serve again as co-chair of Steering and Policy for another two years, and so looking forward to working with a partner here, with Congresswoman Donna Edwards. And we have worked together over the last couple of years particularly on issues that are affecting both working women and working men in our community.

And I'm also pleased to work with the Steering and Policy Committee as we address the pressing issues that face the American people. Democrats have an important mission in the next two years. We need to stand up for the middle class. We need to stand up for the working poor and for the vulnerable. And the important economic issues of the day, the most important challenge for people today is that they're in jobs that don't pay them enough money to live on.

The leader understands that to a fare-thee-well, and quite frankly there's no one who's better able to lead us as we face those economic challenges, and that what we need to do for the middle class and for working men and women in this nation, and that is, is to look at the kinds of how we create jobs, how we look at increasing that minimum wage, how we look at rebuilding this country through infrastructure and creating jobs that cannot be outsourced, how we pay attention to education and the cost of allowing people to go to school again in this nation.

Today we know that student loan debt is larger than credit card debt -- big issues that we need to face. And as I said, that the leader understands that better than anyone. She has a clear vision. She has a progressive vision. She listens. She understands. And she brings together the interests of a very diverse caucus. It's not homogenous. I don't have to tell you about a Democratic caucus. And leading us is a task that she takes on. And she really demonstrates to the caucus her strengths, and by doing that provides strength to where we want to try to go.

So I am proud to serve in the leadership with Leader Pelosi, with the rest of my colleagues here. And I'm proud to be a part of what is a very, very strong team. And I would just say to the folks out there -- don't underestimate us. (Laughter.)

REP. PELOSI: Wow. Thank you, Rosa, for your ongoing leadership and your strong message. We have a newcomer to the leadership in the House Democratic Caucus -- not a newcomer to being a leader, though, as chair of the Democratic Women's Working Group. She led us around the country on a bus. When women succeed, American succeeds. She leads us with her deep values, her political astuteness, her knowledge of the issues as she's going to be just a wonderful addition to the leadership as she co-chairs with Rosa the Steering and Policy Committee -- Congresswoman Donna Edwards of Maryland.

REPRESENTATIVE DONNA EDWARDS (D-MD): Thank you, Madam Leader. And I have to tell you, I am so blown away just to be standing here today as part of this new and refreshing leadership team, and I cannot think the leader enough for displaying the confidence in me and my colleagues to put our foot forward for the 21st century for working people in this country. And I want to say a couple of thank yous, in addition to the -- to the leader. It has been a real privilege to work with Steve Israel, our outgoing chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign committee in recruiting a caliber-class of candidates and making sure that we have the resources that we need to do the job.

And now, we have the great privilege of being able to stand alongside, work with and for my good friend, Ben Ray Lujan. I cannot say enough about him. He truly is a leader; he has demonstrated that since day one that he came into the Congress. And I'm looking forward to the work that we're going to do together to do as he's described, and that is, put forward both an agenda for the American people and for working people that says, we know who you are, we're invested in you, and we want you to be invested in us, and I know that our soon-to-be chairman, Ben Ray Lujan, is going to do that for us, and I look forward to supporting him in that effort. And what can I say about my colleague, Rosa DeLauro? She is such a champion and has such energy, and I only hope I can match that energy -- (laughter) -- on the Steering and Policy Committee --

REP. PELOSI: You're not Italian, you see, and that's -- (inaudible) --

REP. EDWARDS: That's right. I'm not. And so, I have work to do, but I'm looking forward to doing it. (Laughter.) And, you know, I think that this is a really exciting day for our Democratic Caucus. Tomorrow will be more exciting when we cement it. But I think what you have standing before you is a leadership team that is interested in the future. And it's really committed, every single bit of the way, to making sure that working families understand that we are on their side, that we know that there is a struggle, that we know that they haven't had a raise in a very, very long time, that we know that every day, they just want to get up and take care of themselves and their families, building a better life for their children, and we have the responsibility of making sure that those dreams come true, and that those opportunities are created, and that there are, indeed, ladders of opportunity for success for the American people, and I am looking forward to doing this.

So, Rosa, I'm with you. (Laughter.)

REP. PELOSI: Thank you. Thank you very much, Congresswoman. Thank you all. Tomorrow, after our elections, which will take place in the morning, our full leadership team will come forward to make our presentation and to answer your questions. I just want to close by saying the following: Now, the Republicans have taken both Houses of the Congress of the United States.

When we did that in 2006 -- Congress sworn in 2007, we worked with President Bush on so many issues. We passed one of the biggest energy bills in the history of our country. We worked with him on a stimulus package -- Rosa was very instrumental in helping us. We did the stimulus and the rebates -- that they were refundable to low-income families. Barney Frank said it was one of the most progressive pieces of legislation to come out of the Congress. We did that with President Bush.

And of course, we worked with him on TARP when his own party abandoned him on that, but we were there, just to name a few examples. We opposed him on the war in Iraq and privatizing Social Security, but that did not have any influence on how we worked with him on other issues. So I want the record to show that we did cooperate with President Bush, and I hope the record will soon show that the newly-elected Republican Congress will work constructively with President Obama. We want to work with them to make progress for the American people.

A couple of years ago, it was building ladders of opportunity for everyone who wants to work hard and play by the rules to achieve the American Dream, to re-ignite the American Dream. This past year, it was jumpstarting the middle class, creating good-paying jobs here in the United States by building infrastructure of our country, making college affordable and when women succeed, America succeeds, with equal pay for equal work.

These are things I think that have a non-partisan nature to them that they are supported by the American people. We have to communicate it in a stronger way. But hopefully, we can do -- act upon all of that in a bipartisan way as we go forward. So I congratulate our leadership team part of the House Democratic leadership. Tomorrow, we'll all be coming out of the caucus with the results of those elections and with expanded opportunity for you to question our members then. But right now, if you have questions -- yes?

Q: A question for Congressman Lujan. Advancing the expectations -- (inaudible) -- Truman administration -- (inaudible) -- Hoover administration if they can pick up one more seat from -- (inaudible). Where do you manage expectations, and is it a realistic goal to try to (be ?) back the majority?

REP. LUJAN: Look, as Steve pointed out, as Chairman Israel pointed out, we saw so many of the American people that didn't come out to vote this year. As we're celebrating and remembering the 50th year of the Voting Rights Act, and we're continuing to see Republicans try to chip away at that, I think it's important that we just go talk to more and more people, and I think we can -- we can set those expectations high.

Going into 2016, we're going to see more of the electorate involved, excited, ready to work, and get ready to get more people elected. And so I think that, again, working closely with Steve and with the team, we'll see those numbers as they roll out. But you saw those very close elections this year where Republicans spent a record amount of money. I think we're going to see more Democrats get elected in 2016, and those numbers are going to surprise you.

Q: (Off mic) -- not all, you know, Latino voters, see it, saying some will see things the way that most Republicans -- (inaudible). How do you see that playing out in the near term? I know two years is a long way away here, but how do you see that playing out in the Latino community despite what will probably emerge maybe even in just the next few days here as a -- (inaudible)?

REP. LUJAN: Chad, the Republicans have been solving comprehensive immigration reform for over two years now. They've had a chance to put a bill up to vote, Speaker Boehner has stalled that. If Republicans in the House and the Senate aren't happy with actions that the president will consider -- and we'll see what those look like going forward -- they're in charge. They can put a bill forward. And I certainly hope that we can come together and work that way.

I don't believe this is going to poison the well, this should encourage everyone to work together. And I certainly hope that we'll see more of that.

STAFF: Last question.

Q: (Off mic) - Congresswoman Duckworth to vote via proxy, and a lot of that -- (inaudible). Could you respond to some of that --

REP. PELOSI: Sure. First of all, let me say that we do have -- I was one of the ones who said to Congresswoman Duckworth don't come back here. This is the most glorious experience of your life, the center of the universe will change for you when you have this precious new baby.

The rules of the caucus are the same as the rules of the House -- no proxy voting -- and would require changing rules of the caucus to -- as opposed to -- as different from the rules of the House. She understood that full well.

The fact is is that it's really important to be here, to be in caucus, it's more important to vote on the floor. If I were to make a vote, I'd vote to have a proxy to vote on the floor than whatever's going on in the caucus. But the fact is is that we don't know what's going on in the lives of many people. I think one of our members may be having an operation this week or that. You're going to establish a situation where we're going to determine who has a note from the doctor that's valid or not. It's really a place we shouldn't go down. But it is not to be confused with not having family and medical leave.

We wish her well. She's a heroine to our country. We're very excited about the baby. And in fact, knowing about the baby, I appointed Congresswoman Duckworth to the Benghazi committee. Only five appointments that I have, I wanted our strongest members there. She informed me of her good news, and I said just take it as it comes. You know, to the extent that you can serve, we want you to be there.

So I don't know why all this fuss was made about a vote in the caucus. I think if the -- if the House wants to change its rules about proxies in general that apply to the floor and the caucus, that's another thing. But we wish her well; she has all of our good wishes and prayers, and I had a very lovely conversation with her. But even, again, knowing that -- of her beautiful expectation very early on, I said, we need your best -- our best thinking there; we need you to be there on the Benghazi committee.

I just want to ask Ben Ray Lujan if he would speak to his mom.

REP. LUJAN: (In Spanish.)

(Laughter.)

REP. PELOSI: Thank you all. See you tomorrow. Thank you.

PELOSI: Good afternoon, everyone. The chairman of the -- hi.

(LAUGHTER)

PELOSI: Hi. The chairman of the House Democratic Caucus has informed members that tomorrow we will elect the leadership team for the 114th Congress. Should I receive the honor of serving as the House Democratic leader, I will be proud to recommend members gathered here for important positions of leadership in our caucus in the new Congress.

As the next chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, I'm pleased to recommend to our colleagues Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico, a dynamic and forward-looking leader with a fresh energy and ideas House Democrats need for victory in 2016.

He has bold vision and determined leadership to deliver wins in difficult districts. I am confident that Congressman Lujan will prove a tireless champion for our members and candidates across the country, and I'm absolutely delighted to recommend him to the caucus.

As chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee for the past few years -- four years, Congressman Steve Israel has consistently proved the depth of his wisdom and the strength of his strategic vision in making the -- our case to the American people. In his new role -- and we thank him for his leadership over those four years.

In his new role as chair of something called Policy and Communications, Congressman Israel will be an invaluable asset to our caucus working closely with the Steering and Policy Committee to develop our caucus message, jump start the middle class, and to reignite the American dream. Thank you, Mr. Israel, for agreeing to serve.

Congresswoman Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut, her innovative and unrelenting leadership -- unrelenting -- unrelenting leadership is essential to our caucus. She is what I call the godmother When Women Succeed, America Succeeds agenda.

Her work on behalf of students and working families is unparalleled. Congresswoman DeLauro is a lioness of our caucus, and I look forward to continuing to work with her as co-chair of the Steering and Policy Committee.

I have to say about Rosa, the 40-some members that are here from the freshman class of last year -- we had 51, I think it's now 45 -- they have entrusted their hopes, dreams, aspirations and their career path to Rosa, and she understands their aspiration as well as even more -- senior members.

So she is an institution that everyone by popular demand insisted that she again serve in this role. It pleased all of us. I'm glad it pleased Rosa to do that.

Congresswoman Donna Edwards of Maryland has been an energetic and impassioned voice within our caucus since she came to caucus. As chair of the Democratic Women's Working Group, she has been a forceful champion for America's women, continuing to work as she began as co- founder and executive director of the National Network to End Domestic Violence.

Congresswoman Edwards' deep grasp of policy and priorities of middle-class families will make her a great asset to our caucus in the role of policy co-chair. These members are tested and tenacious members of our caucus. They have the energy and the vision to win progress for the American people. I'm excited to work with them in these important roles.

And I'm very pleased and honored to yield to my nominee to be chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, Ben Ray -- Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico.

LUJAN: Thank you, Leader Pelosi. And I want to apologize for everyone for keeping everyone waiting. It was me that caused the delay. I shared with Speaker Pelosi as I was walking in that I couldn't get mom off the phone. And as I was visiting with mom to visit with her, you can imagine it was emotional. It was joyous.

My father, who passed away two years ago, was the former speaker of the New Mexico House of Representatives and was actively involved fro a grassroots perspective in organizing leaders and making sure that we were looking after the working people of America. So I want to apologize for the press ahead of time for that delay as well.

I want to thank Leader Pelosi for the opportunity and commend her and Chairman Israel for their leadership. I've been working with the chairman as part of the Latino Council and saw the tremendous job he did in recruiting at the DCCC and in growing in a historically challenging cycle.

I look forward to working with him in the coming days so that I can hit the ground running, take lessons from the recent elections, and get right to work to ensure that we have the great candidates, resource and messages to begin a successful 2016. I know that Chairman Israel has already been recruiting, working actively as he always has from day one, and I look forward to that same work ethic going forward.

Already less than a month removed from the elections, House Republicans are once again talking about shutting down the government rather than working with Democrats and the president to tackle the issue facing families across our nation. They've stood in the way of increasing the minimum wage, equal pay for equal work and comprehensive immigration reform.

As the chair of the DCCC, I will work to make sure that House Republicans are held accountable for this reckless behavior and that the American people see the clear difference between House Democrats, who have a plan for job creation, make college more affordable, raise the minimum wage and fix our broken immigration system.

There will be great opportunities in 2016 to make gains with the more favorable electorate during a presidential year. And with many districts held by Republicans that President Obama won, we will be on the offensive to put the majority in place.

Again, thank you Leader Pelosi, and I look forward to getting to work.

PELOSI: Thank you very much, Chairman Lujan. It is with my -- with great appreciation and admiration for a job well done that I now yield to the new chair of Communications and Policy, Congressman Steve Israel of New York, really of the whole country. He travels so much.

ISRAEL: Thank you, Leader. Thank you. Now if you think that Ben Ray is happy, you have no idea how happy I am.

PELOSI: Even happier than his mom?

ISRAEL: This may be the happiest day in my life. I am -- I'm incredibly excited by Leader Pelosi's decision to reorganize the leadership of our caucus and create a position as chairman of Policy and Communications.

Leader Pelosi and I have talked about this extensively. I'm going to be very brief, and then I'm going to brag on -- on my friend Ben Ray. Our country is experiencing the deepest and the most acute anxiety for the middle class in history.

In the past election, one third of the eligible voters voted for a Democrat or a Republican. Two thirds of voters stayed home because they've lost faith in government's ability to understand their anxiety and solve their economic challenges.

In fact, if you take a look at the past several elections, voters have us all on a very short leash. They give a majority and they take it away very quickly literally every few years because of this intense economic anxiety that they have.

And it's understandable. Since the recovery began, the economy's grown 12 percent. Corporate profits have grown 46 percent. The stock market has grown 92 percent, but median household income has declined by 3 percent. So no wonder they're anxious. No wonder they feel this insecurity.

Now voters on both -- both parties have -- voter have put both parties on a short leash, but intuitively they know that Democrats have always been the party of the middle class and working families and will continue to be the party of the middle class and working families.

And this new position within the Democratic leadership will bring our messaging and our policies, particularly on middle-class anxieties, to a new and never before seen level for our caucus.

And I look forward to working with Leader Pelosi, working closely with Steering and Policy, working with every member of our caucus to project and amplify and focus intensely on that message that we are the party of the middle class and we are the party of middle-class security and opportunity.

Leader Pelosi wants to proactively create a middle-class movement that focuses on wage growth in the middle class, that focuses on new opportunities. And that's precisely what this new effort will do, and precisely what the leader has asked me to focus on in terms of policy and communications.

Now, a final word about Ben Ray Lujan. I shared the D triple C for four years. And I must tell you that I can't think of a group of members more operational, more committed, more devoted, more dedicated than Donna Edwards, who did our recruiting, and Ben Ray Lujan, who, when given a mission, just did the mission. No drama, no excitement. Just achieved the goal. Both Donna and Ben Ray were just incredibly positive and operational. I'm very grateful to both of them. And I look forward to supporting Donna in her new position as co-chair Steering and Policy, and supporting Ben Ray in his new position as chair of the D triple C. So, thank you, Leader Pelosi, for giving me this opportunity and allowing me to continue my work for the D triple C with Ben ray.

Thank you.

PELOSI: Thank you very much, Chairman Israel. I don't know when this takes effect. I guess when the members vote tomorrow. After we -- after we have our own elections. And since I don't have an opponent, there -- a possibility that I might get elected, but we'll see tomorrow. And then we take these recommendations to the caucus. And one of the -- the election of Steering and Policy chairs, though, is it is a function of the Steering and Policy Committee.

The Steering piece is that, you know -- or the committee assignments, et cetera -- the policy piece is just as it says. And Rosa DeLauro is an expert on both. As I said, by popular demand of the members, she is back in that position as the leader on policy in our caucus. Since she came to the Congress, we have learned a lot from her, and continue to do so as co-chair of Steering and Policy.

Thank you.

. DELAURO: Thank you very, very much. And it's a really exciting day. And I want to say thank you to you, Madam Leader, and for your continued trust in me, and the continued trust of -- of my colleagues. It's -- as you mentioned, that is heartwarming. Because you're always -- it's always more difficult with your peers. You want to make sure that they're -- they're standing with you.

I'm delighted to serve again as co-chair of Steering and Policy for another two years, and so looking forward to working with -- with a partner here with Congresswoman Donna Edwards. PELOSI: You're not Italian, you see, and that's...

(CROSSTALK)

EDWARDS: That's right. I'm not. And so I have work to do, but I'm looking forward to doing it.

(LAUGHTER)

And, you know, I think that this is a really exciting day for our Democratic Caucus. Tomorrow will be more exciting when we cement it. But I think what you have standing before you is a leadership team that is interested in the future. And it's really committed every single bit of the way to making sure that working families understand that we are on their side; that we know that there is a struggle; that we know that they haven't had a raise in a very, very long time; that we know that

So Rosa, I'm with you.

(LAUGHTER)

PELOSI: Thank you. Thank you very much, Congresswoman. Thank you all.

Tomorrow after our election, which will take place in the morning, our full leadership team will come forward to make our presentation and to answer your questions.

I just want to close by saying the following. Now, the Republicans have taken both Houses of the Congress of the United States. But when we did that in 2006 (inaudible) elect -- a Congress sworn in in 2007, we worked with President Bush on so many issues. So I congratulate our leadership team. Part of the House Democratic leadership tomorrow will all be coming out of the caucus with the results of those elections and with an expanded opportunity for you to question our members then. But right now if you have questions -- yes?

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) just managing expectations. Republicans have built their largest majority since at least the Truman administration, possibly even the Hoover administration if they can pick up one more seat from these outstanding races.

Where do you manage expectations, and is it a realistic goal to try to (inaudible) back a majority?

LUJAN: Look, as Steve pointed out, as Chairman Israel pointed out, we -- we saw so many of the American people that didn't come out to vote this year.

If Republicans in the House and the Senate aren't happy with actions that the president will consider -- and we'll see what those look like going forward -- they -- they're in charge. They can put a bill forward.

And I certainly hope that we can come together and work that way. I don't believe this is going to poison the well. This should encourage everyone to work together, and I'm certainly hopeful that we'll see more of that.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) and a lot of that seemed directly (inaudible) positions on leave for women who have (inaudible). Could you respond to some of that criticism (ph)?

PELOSI: Sure. First of all, let me say that we do have -- I was one of the ones who said to Congresswoman Duckworth, don't come back here. This is the most glorious experience of your life. The center of the universe will change for you when you have this precious new baby.

The rules of the caucus are the same as the rules of the House, no proxy voting, and would require changing rules of the caucus to -- as opposed to -- as different from the rules of the House. She understood that full well.

The fact is is that it's really important to be here, to be in caucus. It's more important to vote on the floor. If I were to make a fight, I'd vote to have a proxy to vote on the floor than in whatever's going on in the caucus.

But the fact is is that we don't know what's going on in the lives of many people. I think one of our members may be having an operation this week or that. You're going to establish a situation where we're going to determine who has a note from the doctor that's valid.

It's really a place we shouldn't go down, but it is not to be confused with not having family and medical leave. We wish her well. She's a heroine to our country. We're very excited about the baby. And in fact, knowing about the baby, I appointed Congresswoman Duckworth to the Benghazi committee. Only five appointments did I have. I wanted our strongest members there.

She informed me of her good news, and I said just take it as it comes. You know, to the extent that you can serve, we want you to be there. So I don't know why all this fuss was made about a vote in the caucus. I think if -- if the House wants to change its rules about proxies in general that applies to the floor and the caucus, that's -- that's another thing.

But we wish her well. She has all of our good wishes and prayers. And I had a very lovely conversation with her. But even again knowing that (inaudible) beautiful expectation very early on, I said we need your best -- our best thinking there. We need you to be there on the Benghazi committee.

I just want to ask Ben Ray Lujan if he would speak to his mom.

LUJAN: (SPEAKING IN SPANISH)

PELOSI: Thank you all.

Polis 'relieved' not to have gotten DCCC job he campaigned for DENVER -- House Democratic Leader Nancy Pelosi announced Monday afternoon that she is appointing Rep. Ben Ray Lujan to serve as chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, the role overseeing the caucus' fundraising and political operation.

In so doing, Pelosi bypassed Colorado Rep. Jared Polis, D-Boulder, who openly coveted the position and was among a half dozen lawmakers considered for the post.

Lujan, in his third term in the House representing New Mexico's 3rd Congressional District, will be the first Hispanic lawmaker to run the DCCC since the 1980s, a signal that Pelosi views Hispanic outreach as critical to the party's chances of rebounding from a bruising 2014 election that has left it with fewer House seats than it's held since the 1940s.

Lujan is known to be well-liked and energetic on Capitol Hill, but not a prolific fundraiser like Polis and Reps. Jim Himes of Connecticut and Donna Edwards of Maryland, who lobbied for the position mostly on their ability to raise money.

"Congressman Ben Ray Luján is an excellent choice for the DCCC chair," Polis said Monday afternoon in a statement. "My top priority since being elected to Congress has always been representing the people of Colorado and I'm relieved not to have to balance that with a partisan office.

"There is much work to be done to balance our budget, keep our economy moving forward, protect the environment of our beautiful state, and ensure that all Coloradans have access to affordable educational opportunities. I will continue to push innovative and bold new ideas, and look forward to working across the aisle to find solutions that improve the lives of Coloradans."

Polis, who is entering his fourth term in the House, is respected as a policy-focused workhorse on the Hill, but also viewed as a man in a hurry.

Earlier this year, he put his significant personal wealth behind two local control ballot measures as a way of forcing the state to deal with the ongoing battle between a growing oil and gas industry and homeowners concerned about the environmental and public health impacts of drilling.

In August, Polis finally agreed to pull the initiatives after Gov. John Hickenlooper formed a task-force to work on policy solutions, but not before alienating many Colorado Democrats who feared that his initiatives would backfire on their ticket in November.

A few months earlier, a Washington Post profile of Polis that focused on his hopes of being appointed DCCC Chairman included this noteworthy quote from his chief of staff:

"Look, he's either going to move up or move out," Dan Turrentine told the Post's Ben Terris.

Pelosi taps first Latino to run campaign operations

BYLINE: Susan Davis, USA TODAY

Susan Davis, USA TODAY

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., will chair the House Democrats' 2016 campaign operation, House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., announced Monday.

Lujan, 42, is the first Latino to be named chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. Pelosi praised him as a "dynamic and forward-looking" leader.

The news conference announcing his appointment started late as an apologetic Lujan explained: "I couldn't get mom off the phone."

The only person happier than Lujan's mother may be outgoing DCCC Chairman Steve Israel, D-N.Y., who is going to head up a new leadership position advising House Democrats on policy and communications. He made clear he was eager to hand over the post. "This may be the happiest day in my life," Israel quipped.

Democrats lost at least a dozen seats on Election Day, giving Republicans their largest majority since the World War II era.

Ben Ray Lujan Is Surprise Pick to Head DCCC

BYLINE: Billy House

LENGTH: 591 words

In a surprise pick, Rep. Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico is the pick of House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi to be the next Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee chair.

Lujan, who is Hispanic, said he plans to "hit the ground running," and that his "expectations are high" for the 2016 congressional elections. He also showed some emotion, ending a news conference with Pelosi by blowing a kiss toward the cameras to his mother back home in New Mexico.

Pelosi called Lujan "a dynamic and forward looking leader with fresh energy and ideas," who she said would lead the party to victory in 2016,

Though Lujan is considered a rising star, the selection of the three-term House member nonetheless came as a surprisebecause five other Democrats had been mentioned more often in recent weeks as contenders to succeed outgoing DCCC Chairman Steve Israel of New York.

Lujan, 42, will head the party's political arm at a time when Democrats have seen their overall fortunes in the House decline dramatically, with a net loss of about 66 seats over four years.

While some believe the party's prospects for a modest rebound in 2016 are boosted with the prospect of Hillary Clinton topping a presidential ticket, for now Democrats will have fewer House members in the new Congress that convenes in January than at any time since the 1940s.

With Lujan, Pelosi has signaled an intention to continue its outreach to progressives and Hispanics, with the party eager to make up ground for the net loss of at least 66 seats since 2010.

Lujan ranked 62nd most liberal in 2013 in National Journal's vote ratings of House memebrs. He has been a modestif not spectacularfundraiser as he is about to enter his fourth term in Congress, having raised at least $1.2 million for his re-election campaign this cycle.

Other lawmakers described more publicly by party sources in recent weeks as vying for the job were Reps. Jim Himes of Connecticut, Joaquin Castro of Texas, Jared Polis of Colorado, Donna Edwards of Maryland, and Lois Frankel of Florida. Rep. Joe Kennedy, D-Mass., was said to be considered a candidate, but took himself out of the running.

Himes, who will also be entering his fourth term in the House, is seen as more of a centrist. But his candidacy came under attack in recent days by progressives, inside and outside of the House. He has served as the DCCC's finance chairman and has been successful in raising moneya lot of it from Wall Streetto help the campaigns of embattled Democrats.

But many complained that choosing the former vice president of Goldman Sachs would send the wrong message that the party was trying to cozy up to Wall Street.

The timing of the announcement came on the eve of Pelosi's unchallenged reelection as minority leader set for Tuesday morning in closed-door Democratic Caucus voting. The reasoning is a new DCCC chief controls a seat on the Democratic Steering and Policy Committeeand that panel of party leaders is itself set to meet later Tuesday to consider several matters.

At the same news conference where Lujan was announced as the new DCCC chief, Pelosi also announced that Edwards would be her pick to succeed outgoing Rep. George Miller of California as a co-chair of the steering committee. She will join Rep. Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut as a co-chair.

Pelosi also announced that Israel would be moving from the DCCC chairman's post to a new job of chair of policy and communications next session.

CORRECTION: An earlier version of this story incorrectly said that Lujan would be the first Hispanic chair of the committee.

REP. NANCY PELOSI, D-CALIF., HOUSE MINORITY LEADER, HOLDS A NEWS CONFERENCE

NOVEMBER 17, 2014

SPEAKERS: REP. NANCY PELOSI, D-CALIF., HOUSE MINORITY LEADER

REP. BEN RAY LUJAN, D-N.M.

REP. STEVE ISRAEL, D-N.Y., CHAIRMAN, DEMOCRATIC CONGRESSIONAL CAMPAIGN COMMITTEE REP. ROSA DELAURO, D-CONN., CO-CHAIR, DEMOCRATIC STEERING AND POLICY COMMITTEE

REP. DONNA EDWARDS, D-MD.

[*] PELOSI: Good afternoon, everyone. The chairman of the -- hi.

(LAUGHTER)

PELOSI: Hi. The chairman of the House Democratic Caucus has informed members that tomorrow we will elect the leadership team for the 114th Congress. Should I receive the honor of serving as the House Democratic leader, I will be proud to recommend members gathered here for important positions of leadership in our caucus in the new Congress.

As the next chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, I'm pleased to recommend to our colleagues Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico, a dynamic and forward-looking leader with a fresh energy and ideas House Democrats need for victory in 2016.

He has bold vision and determined leadership to deliver wins in difficult districts. I am confident that Congressman Lujan will prove a tireless champion for our members and candidates across the country, and I'm absolutely delighted to recommend him to the caucus.

As chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee for the past few years -- four years, Congressman Steve Israel has consistently proved the depth of his wisdom and the strength of his strategic vision in making the -- our case to the American people. In his new role -- and we thank him for his leadership over those four years.

In his new role as chair of something called Policy and Communications, Congressman Israel will be an invaluable asset to our caucus working closely with the Steering and Policy Committee to develop our caucus message, jump start the middle class, and to reignite the American dream. Thank you, Mr. Israel, for agreeing to serve.

Congresswoman Rosa DeLauro of Connecticut, her innovative and unrelenting leadership -- unrelenting -- unrelenting leadership is essential to our caucus. She is what I call the godmother When Women Succeed, America Succeeds agenda.

Her work on behalf of students and working families is unparalleled. Congresswoman DeLauro is a lioness of our caucus, and I look forward to continuing to work with her as co-chair of the Steering and Policy Committee.

I have to say about Rosa, the 40-some members that are here from the freshman class of last year -- we had 51, I think it's now 45 -- they have entrusted their hopes, dreams, aspirations and their career path to Rosa, and she understands their aspiration as well as even more -- senior members.

So she is an institution that everyone by popular demand insisted that she again serve in this role. It pleased all of us. I'm glad it pleased Rosa to do that.

Congresswoman Donna Edwards of Maryland has been an energetic and impassioned voice within our caucus since she came to caucus. As chair of the Democratic Women's Working Group, she has been a forceful champion for America's women, continuing to work as she began as co- founder and executive director of the National Network to End Domestic Violence.

Congresswoman Edwards' deep grasp of policy and priorities of middle-class families will make her a great asset to our caucus in the role of policy co-chair. These members are tested and tenacious members of our caucus. They have the energy and the vision to win progress for the American people. I'm excited to work with them in these important roles.

And I'm very pleased and honored to yield to my nominee to be chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, Ben Ray -- Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico.

LUJAN: Thank you, Leader Pelosi. And I want to apologize for everyone for keeping everyone waiting. It was me that caused the delay. I shared with Speaker Pelosi as I was walking in that I couldn't get mom off the phone. And as I was visiting with mom to visit with her, you can imagine it was emotional. It was joyous.

My father, who passed away two years ago, was the former speaker of the New Mexico House of Representatives and was actively involved fro a grassroots perspective in organizing leaders and making sure that we were looking after the working people of America. So I want to apologize for the press ahead of time for that delay as well.

I want to thank Leader Pelosi for the opportunity and commend her and Chairman Israel for their leadership. I've been working with the chairman as part of the Latino Council and saw the tremendous job he did in recruiting at the DCCC and in growing in a historically challenging cycle.

I look forward to working with him in the coming days so that I can hit the ground running, take lessons from the recent elections, and get right to work to ensure that we have the great candidates, resource and messages to begin a successful 2016. I know that Chairman Israel has already been recruiting, working actively as he always has from day one, and I look forward to that same work ethic going forward.

Already less than a month removed from the elections, House Republicans are once again talking about shutting down the government rather than working with Democrats and the president to tackle the issue facing families across our nation. They've stood in the way of increasing the minimum wage, equal pay for equal work and comprehensive immigration reform. As the chair of the DCCC, I will work to make sure that House Republicans are held accountable for this reckless behavior and that the American people see the clear difference between House Democrats, who have a plan for job creation, make college more affordable, raise the minimum wage and fix our broken immigration system.

There will be great opportunities in 2016 to make gains with the more favorable electorate during a presidential year. And with many districts held by Republicans that President Obama won, we will be on the offensive to put the majority in place.

Again, thank you Leader Pelosi, and I look forward to getting to work.

PELOSI: Thank you very much, Chairman Lujan. It is with my -- with great appreciation and admiration for a job well done that I now yield to the new chair of Communications and Policy, Congressman Steve Israel of New York, really of the whole country. He travels so much.

ISRAEL: Thank you, Leader. Thank you. Now if you think that Ben Ray is happy, you have no idea how happy I am.

PELOSI: Even happier than his mom?

ISRAEL: This may be the happiest day in my life. I am -- I'm incredibly excited by Leader Pelosi's decision to reorganize the leadership of our caucus and create a position as chairman of Policy and Communications.

Leader Pelosi and I have talked about this extensively. I'm going to be very brief, and then I'm going to brag on -- on my friend Ben Ray. Our country is experiencing the deepest and the most acute anxiety for the middle class in history.

In the past election, one third of the eligible voters voted for a Democrat or a Republican. Two thirds of voters stayed home because they've lost faith in government's ability to understand their anxiety and solve their economic challenges.

In fact, if you take a look at the past several elections, voters have us all on a very short leash. They give a majority and they take it away very quickly literally every few years because of this intense economic anxiety that they have.

And it's understandable. Since the recovery began, the economy's grown 12 percent. Corporate profits have grown 46 percent. The stock market has grown 92 percent, but median household income has declined by 3 percent. So no wonder they're anxious. No wonder they feel this insecurity.

Now voters on both -- both parties have -- voter have put both parties on a short leash, but intuitively they know that Democrats have always been the party of the middle class and working families and will continue to be the party of the middle class and working families. And this new position within the Democratic leadership will bring our messaging and our policies, particularly on middle-class anxieties, to a new and never before seen level for our caucus.

And I look forward to working with Leader Pelosi, working closely with Steering and Policy, working with every member of our caucus to project and amplify and focus intensely on that message that we are the party of the middle class and we are the party of middle-class security and opportunity.

Leader Pelosi wants to proactively create a middle-class movement that focuses on wage growth in the middle class, that focuses on new opportunities. And that's precisely what this new effort will do, and precisely what the leader has asked me to focus on in terms of policy and communications.

Now, a final word about Ben Ray Lujan. I shared the D triple C for four years. And I must tell you that I can't think of a group of members more operational, more committed, more devoted, more dedicated than Donna Edwards, who did our recruiting, and Ben Ray Lujan, who, when given a mission, just did the mission. No drama, no excitement. Just achieved the goal. Both Donna and Ben Ray were just incredibly positive and operational. I'm very grateful to both of them. And I look forward to supporting Donna in her new position as co-chair Steering and Policy, and supporting Ben Ray in his new position as chair of the D triple C. So, thank you, Leader Pelosi, for giving me this opportunity and allowing me to continue my work for the D triple C with Ben ray.

Thank you.

PELOSI: Thank you very much, Chairman Israel. I don't know when this takes effect. I guess when the members vote tomorrow. After we -- after we have our own elections. And since I don't have an opponent, there -- a possibility that I might get elected, but we'll see tomorrow. And then we take these recommendations to the caucus. And one of the -- the election of Steering and Policy chairs, though, is it is a function of the Steering and Policy Committee.

The Steering piece is that, you know -- or the committee assignments, et cetera -- the policy piece is just as it says. And Rosa DeLauro is an expert on both. As I said, by popular demand of the members, she is back in that position as the leader on policy in our caucus. Since she came to the Congress, we have learned a lot from her, and continue to do so as co-chair of Steering and Policy.

Thank you.

. DELAURO: Thank you very, very much. And it's a really exciting day. And I want to say thank you to you, Madam Leader, and for your continued trust in me, and the continued trust of -- of my colleagues. It's -- as you mentioned, that is heartwarming. Because you're always -- it's always more difficult with your peers. You want to make sure that they're -- they're standing with you.

I'm delighted to serve again as co-chair of Steering and Policy for another two years, and so looking forward to working with -- with a partner here with Congresswoman Donna Edwards. And we have worked together over the last couple of years, particularly on issues that are affecting both working women and working men in our community.

And also pleased to work with the Steering and Policy Committee as we address the pressing issues that face the American people.

Democrats have an important mission in the next two years. We need to stand up for the middle class. We need to stand up for the working poor, and for the vulnerable. And the important economic issues of the day -- the most important challenge for people today is that they're in jobs that don't pay them enough money to live on. The leader understands that to (inaudible). And, quite frankly, there's no one better able to lead us as we face those economic challenges. And that's what we need to do for the middle class and for working men and women in this nation. And that is, is to look at the kinds of -- how we create jobs, how we look at increasing that minimum wage, how we look at rebuilding this country through infrastructure and creating jobs that cannot be outsourced. How we pay attention to education and the cost of -- of allowing people to go to school again in -- in this nation.

Today we know that student loan debt is larger than credit card debt. Big issues that we need to face. And, as I said, that the -- the leader understands that better than anyone. She has a clear vision. She has a progressive vision. She listens, she understands, and she brings together the interests of a very diverse caucus. It's not homogeneous. I don't have to tell you about a Democratic Caucus. And leading us is -- is a task that she takes on, and she really demonstrates to the caucus her strength. And by doing that, provides strength to where we want to try to go.

So, I am proud to serve in the leadership with Leader Pelosi, with the rest of my colleagues here, and I'm proud to be a part of what is a very, very strong team. And I would just say to the folks out there, don't underestimate us.

(LAUGHTER)

PELOSI: Wow. Thank you, Rosa, for your ongoing leadership and your strong message.

We have a newcomer to the leadership in the House Democratic Caucus -- not a newcomer to being a leader, though, as chair of the Democratic Women's Working Group, she led us around the country on a bus. When women succeed, America succeeds. She leads us with her deep values, her political astuteness, her knowledge of the issues. She's going to be just a wonderful addition to the leadership as she chairs -- co-chairs with Rosa the Steering and Policy Committee.

Congresswoman Donna Edwards of Maryland.

EDWARDS: Thank you, Madam Leader.

And I have to tell you, I am so blown away just to be standing here today as part of this new and refreshing leadership team. And I cannot thank the leader enough for displaying the confidence in me and my colleagues to put our foot forward for the 21st century for working people in this country.

And I want to say a couple of thank yous in addition to the leader. It has been a real privilege to work with Steve Israel, our outgoing chair of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, in recruiting a caliber class of candidates and making sure that we had the resources that we need to do the job.

And now we have the great privilege of being able to stand alongside, work with and for my good friend, Ben Ray Lujan. I cannot say enough about him. He truly is a leader. He has demonstrated that since day one that he came into the Congress. And I'm looking forward to the work that we're going to do together to do, as he's described, and that is put forward both an agenda for the American people and for working people that says, "We know who you are; we're invested in you; and we want you to be invested in us."

And I know that our soon-to-be chairman, Ben Ray Lujan, is doing to do that for us. And I look forward to supporting him in that effort.

And what can I say about my colleague, Rosa DeLauro? She is such a champion and has such energy. And I only hope I can match that energy on the Steering and Policy Committee.

PELOSI: You're not Italian, you see, and that's...

(CROSSTALK)

EDWARDS: That's right. I'm not. And so I have work to do, but I'm looking forward to doing it.

(LAUGHTER)

And, you know, I think that this is a really exciting day for our Democratic Caucus. Tomorrow will be more exciting when we cement it. But I think what you have standing before you is a leadership team that is interested in the future. And it's really committed every single bit of the way to making sure that working families understand that we are on their side; that we know that there is a struggle; that we know that they haven't had a raise in a very, very long time; that we know that every day they just want to get up and take care of themselves and their families, build a better life for their -- for their children.

And we have the responsibility of making sure that those dreams come true and that those opportunities are created, and that there are indeed ladders of opportunity for success for the American people. And I am looking forward to doing this.

So Rosa, I'm with you.

(LAUGHTER)

PELOSI: Thank you. Thank you very much, Congresswoman. Thank you all.

Tomorrow after our election, which will take place in the morning, our full leadership team will come forward to make our presentation and to answer your questions.

I just want to close by saying the following. Now, the Republicans have taken both Houses of the Congress of the United States. But when we did that in 2006 (inaudible) elect -- a Congress sworn in in 2007, we worked with President Bush on so many issues. We passed one of the biggest energy bills in the history of our country. We worked with him on a stimulus package. Rosa was very instrumental in helping as we did stimulus and the rebates, that they were refundable to low-income families.

Barney Frank said it was one of the most progressive pieces of legislation to come out of the Congress. We did that with President Bush. And of course, we worked with him on TARP when his own party abandoned him on that, but we were there. Just to name a few examples.

We opposed him on the war in Iraq and privatizing Social Security, but that did not have an influence on how we worked with him on other issues.

So I want the record to show that we did cooperate with President Bush, and I hope the record will soon show that the newly elected Republican Congress will work constructively with President Obama.

We -- we want to work with them to make progress for the American people. A couple of years ago it was building ladders of opportunity for everyone who wants to work hard and play by the rules to achieve the American dream, to reignite the American dream.

This past year, it was jump starting the middle class, creating good-paying jobs here in the United States by building infrastructure of our country, making college affordable, and When Women Succeed, American Succeeds with equal pay for equal work.

These are things that I think have a nonpartisan nature to them. They are supported by the American people. We have to communicate it in a stronger way. But hopefully we can do -- act upon all of that in a bipartisan way as go we go forward.

So I congratulate our leadership team. Part of the House Democratic leadership tomorrow will all be coming out of the caucus with the results of those elections and with an expanded opportunity for you to question our members then. But right now if you have questions -- yes?

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) just managing expectations. Republicans have built their largest majority since at least the Truman administration, possibly even the Hoover administration if they can pick up one more seat from these outstanding races.

Where do you manage expectations, and is it a realistic goal to try to (inaudible) back a majority? LUJAN: Look, as Steve pointed out, as Chairman Israel pointed out, we -- we saw so many of the American people that didn't come out to vote this year.

As we're celebrating and remembering the 50th year of the Voting Rights Act and we're continuing to see Republicans try to chip away at that, I think it's important that we just go talk to more and more people.

And I think we can -- we can set those expectations high. Going into 2016, we're going to see more of the electorate involved, excited, ready to work, and get ready to get more people elected. And so I think that, again, working closely with Steve and with the team, we'll see those numbers as they roll out.

But you saw those very close elections this year where Republicans spent a record amount of money. I think we're going to see more Democrats get elected in 2016 and those numbers are going to surprise you.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) some things the way that most Republicans appear to see this issue. How do you see that playing out in the near term? I know two years is a long way away here, but how do you see that playing out in the Latino community as this fight will probably emerge maybe even in just the next few days here (inaudible)?

LUJAN: Chad (ph), the Republicans have been selling comprehensive immigration reform for over two years now. They've had a chance to put a bill up to vote. Speaker Boehner has stalled that. If Republicans in the House and the Senate aren't happy with actions that the president will consider -- and we'll see what those look like going forward -- they -- they're in charge. They can put a bill forward.

And I certainly hope that we can come together and work that way. I don't believe this is going to poison the well. This should encourage everyone to work together, and I'm certainly hopeful that we'll see more of that.

QUESTION: (OFF-MIKE) and a lot of that seemed directly (inaudible) positions on leave for women who have (inaudible). Could you respond to some of that criticism (ph)?

PELOSI: Sure. First of all, let me say that we do have -- I was one of the ones who said to Congresswoman Duckworth, don't come back here. This is the most glorious experience of your life. The center of the universe will change for you when you have this precious new baby.

The rules of the caucus are the same as the rules of the House, no proxy voting, and would require changing rules of the caucus to -- as opposed to -- as different from the rules of the House. She understood that full well.

The fact is is that it's really important to be here, to be in caucus. It's more important to vote on the floor. If I were to make a fight, I'd vote to have a proxy to vote on the floor than in whatever's going on in the caucus.

But the fact is is that we don't know what's going on in the lives of many people. I think one of our members may be having an operation this week or that. You're going to establish a situation where we're going to determine who has a note from the doctor that's valid.

It's really a place we shouldn't go down, but it is not to be confused with not having family and medical leave. We wish her well. She's a heroine to our country. We're very excited about the baby. And in fact, knowing about the baby, I appointed Congresswoman Duckworth to the Benghazi committee. Only five appointments did I have. I wanted our strongest members there.

She informed me of her good news, and I said just take it as it comes. You know, to the extent that you can serve, we want you to be there. So I don't know why all this fuss was made about a vote in the caucus. I think if -- if the House wants to change its rules about proxies in general that applies to the floor and the caucus, that's -- that's another thing.

But we wish her well. She has all of our good wishes and prayers. And I had a very lovely conversation with her. But even again knowing that (inaudible) beautiful expectation very early on, I said we need your best -- our best thinking there. We need you to be there on the Benghazi committee.

I just want to ask Ben Ray Lujan if he would speak to his mom.

LUJAN: (SPEAKING IN SPANISH)

PELOSI: Thank you all.

DEMÓCRATAS CONGRESO;
Pelosi nombra al hispano Luján presidente del Comité de Campaña Demócrata

BYLINE: rg/pa

LENGTH: 300 palabras

Washington, 17 nov (EFEUSA).- El congresista por Nuevo México Ben Ray Luján será el próximo presidente del Comité de Campaña Demócrata del Congreso (DCCC, en inglés) y el primer hispano en ocupar el puesto, anunció hoy la líder de la minoría en la Cámara de Representantes, Nancy Pelosi."Estoy orgullosa de anunciar que el próximo presidente del DCCC será Ben Ray Luján, cuya visión, energía y liderazgo traerá a los demócratas de la Cámara la victoria en 2016," dijo Pelosi en su cuenta de la red social Twitter.

Pese a la buena consideración que está cosechando el legislador de origen latino, ha resultado toda una sorpresa, porque varios miembros de la bancada habían sido mencionados como posibles sustitutos del presidente saliente, Steve Israel (Nueva York), pero no él.

Luján, de 42 años, estará al frente del brazo político del partido en un momento crítico para los demócratas tras la debacle demócrata en los comicios legislativos del pasado día 4, cuando los republicanos les arrebataron el Senado e hicieron aún más fuerte su mayoría en la Cámara Baja.

Pese a que muchos analistas consideran que la llegada de Hillary Clinton como más que posible candidata a la Presidencia será un revulsivo para los demócratas también en el Capitolio, lo cierto es que tendrán mucho trabajo para recuperar los 66 escaños que se han dejado por el camino desde 2010.

Aún así, el movimiento de la líder de la minoría sigue el patrón del de su par en el Senado, Harry Reid, quien acercándose también a la senadora Elizabeth Warren ha mostrado la intención de su bancada de dotar de más frescura al partido de cara a los próximos dos años.

Está previsto que Pelosi sea reelegida este martes como cabeza de su partido en la Cámara Baja para el próximo Congreso, cuya andadura comienza en enero próximo. EFEUSA

In a party full of urbanites, the new DCCC chairman comes from one of most rural Democratic districts

BYLINE: Philip Bump

LENGTH: 349 words

If the measure of political importance in the House is district size (which is at least part of the implicit argument every time you see a map like this), House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) picked one of the most powerful members of her caucus to lead the party's congressional campaign arm for the next two years.

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan (D-N.M.) is Pelosi's choice to run the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, succeeding Rep. Steve Israel (D-N.Y.). And Lujan, as of January, will represent the second-largest district still in Democratic hands.

Lujan's Santa Fe-based 3rd congressional district is just under 45,000 square miles, according to the Census Bureau. That puts it in fourth place for current Democratic representatives, behind Nevada's 4th (50,997 square miles), Arizona's 1st (55,000) and Texas's 23rd (58,000).

You'll notice that the Democrats lost two of those seats earlier this month (Nevada and Texas). That's indirectly related to their size; since House seats all (roughly) represent the same number of voters, that means that these four districts are among the least population-dense districts in the country. Which means they're more rural. Which means they're more likely to vote Republican.

The reverse is also true, to a lesser degree. There are 18 House seats currently held by Democrats that are smaller than the smallest House seat held by a Republican -- all in cities that are more likely to vote Democratic. And that smallest Republican district is a lot smaller than the next-smallest. The second-smallest Republican district is bigger than a quarter of all of the Democrats' districts. And, sure enough, the smallest was one of the most closely contested this year: New York's 11th district, held by the always-colorful Rep. Michael Grimm (R).

The biggest Republican ones are massive. In fifth place is New Mexico's 2nd, adjacent to Lujan's district -- and 25,000 square miles bigger. (That's 380 NY-11s, for scale.) The largest Republican district doesn't have a fancy name like "Alabama's 2nd" or "Colorado's 5th."

We usually just call it, "Alaska."

Ben Ray Lujan chosen as next DCCC chairman

BYLINE: Ed O'Keefe

LENGTH: 725 words

House Minority Leader Nancy Pelosi (D-Calif.) has selected Rep. Ben Ray Lujan (D-N.M.) to serve as the next chairman of the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee, a plum assignment heading into a 2016 political cycle that is expected to be much more beneficial for Democrats.

Pelosi plans to make the decision official on Monday afternoon, but previewed her pick in an interview with The Washington Post, saying that Lujan "is really a focused operational person. He understands that getting out the vote is what this is and how we message to our base and how we message across the board to the persuadables and the rest."

"I'm choosing him because of his political astuteness, and he can manage all of this very well," she said during an interview in her office at the U.S. Capitol.

Pelosi is expected to be easily reelected as House minority leader when Democrats meet behind closed doors on Tuesday morning to begin their leadership elections for the next Congress. Her lieutenants, Minority Whip Steny Hoyer (D-Md.) and Rep. James Clyburn (D-S.C.) also are expected to win another term atop the caucus.

Lujan, 42, will be a fresh and much younger face among top House Democrats. Lujan, who will be the first Latino ever to hold the job of party campaign chairman, begins his fourth term in Congress in January. He is a member of the House Energy and Commerce Committee and a vice chairman with the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, leading the group's political action committee with a focus on helping more Latinos win seats in Congress.

The congressman's father, Ben Lujan, once served as speaker of the New Mexico House of Representatives and his cousin is Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-N.M.), another member of New Mexico's congressional delegation.

Pelosi also detailed plans Monday to fill out her leadership team. She will give outgoing DCCC chairman, Rep. Steve Israel (D-N.Y.), the newly created position of chairman of policy and communications -- essentially a leading messaging role for the caucus. Israel has led the DCCC through the last two political cycles, during which the party failed to retake the majority, losing at least eight seats this year.

Two loyal Pelosi allies, Reps. Rosa DeLauro (D-Conn.) and Donna Edwards (D-Md.), will be tapped to serve as co-chairmen of the caucus's policy and steering committee. The influential roles give longtime Pelosi friend DeLauro and Edwards, who is considered a rising star and potentially future statewide candidate in Maryland, the job of determining which party members will serve on key committees next year.

Lujan is a dark-horse candidate to lead the DCCC, someone who's name hadn't been floated publicly in recent days. Other names mentioned included Rep. Joseph Kennedy III (D-Mass.), who asked that his name be withdrawn from consideration. Others included Rep. Jim Himes (D-Conn.), who served as the committee's finance chairman for the past two years, and Rep. Joaquin Castro (D-Tex.), a freshman member whose brother, Julian Castro, is serving as secretary of Housing and Urban Development.

Pelosi called Himes "a wonderful person" who did "better than anybody" in assuring that Democrats gave money to the DCCC for the election cycle. But she disputed suggestions that she had been considering Castro for the role.

"I read about it in the paper. Or not in the paper - but people were calling me saying 'I hear you're going to announce Joaquin.' I've never had a conversation with Joaquin about this, he's never told me he's interested," she said.

She said she spoke with and selected Lujan "in the last few days."

During the interview, Pelosi said that she has no plans to relinquish her leadership position until Democrats retake control of the House.

"I could have walked away, but we built something and then we want to take it to the next step," she said. She added that she's been steering Democrats on a "path" since the 2000 political cycle that helped them retake control in 2006 and build on their gains in 2008, though they've suffered setbacks in the years since.

"I thought I'd be long gone by now," she said, because "I thought we'd win the third term in the majority [in 2010] and I would have completed some of the work. I'm not here because I want to have the accoutrement of being leader. I'm here because we have a mission to accomplish for the American people."

Pelosi picks Lujan to helm DCCC

BYLINE: By Eric Bradner, CNN

SECTION: POLITICS

LENGTH: 155 words

DATELINE: Washington

House Democratic leader Nancy Pelosi is tapping a fresh face -- 42-year-old Latino Rep. Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico -- to replace Rep. Steve Israel of New York at the helm of the party's campaign efforts.

Israel chaired the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee during the 2012 and 2014 elections but had said in the wake of this year's Republican victories that he wouldn't seek a third term in that role.

Lujan, a former state utility regulator who was first elected to Congress in 2008, is set to start his fourth term representing a congressional district that includes Santa Fe.

Pelosi tweeted the news of Lujan's selection Monday.

Lujan is one of the Democratic caucuses younger members, a group that has faced pressure to bring newer members to the leadership table. Lujan will face a tall task: After a drubbing in the 2014 midterms, Democrats have just 186 House seats to the GOP's 244, with five races still undecided.

NM leaders split on Obama immigration action; Plan could protect millions from deportation

BYLINE: Copyright © 2014 Albuquerque Journal BY MICHAEL COLEMAN JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: FRONT PAGE; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1235 words

WASHINGTON - President Barack Obama's plan to bypass Congress and defer deportation for millions of immigrants who are in the country illegally has at least tentative support from Democrats in New Mexico's congressional delegation and vehement opposition from its lone Republican.

The White House has not publicly released details of Obama's controversial plan to use executive authority to address America's immigration challenges, but news outlets last week reported what they said are key elements of the plan.

Actions reportedly under consideration by the president, according to The Associated Press, include:

Extend protection from deportation to millions of immigrant parents and spouses of U.S. citizens and permanent residents, and expand a 2-year-old program that shields immigrants brought illegally to this country as children.

Could cover as many as 5 million people.

Offer the possibility of obtaining work permits to some.

A White House official told the Journal on Friday that Obama is still fine-tuning details of his plan and declined to cite key provisions, but the official confirmed that executive action on immigration is imminent.

"The president has not made a decision regarding the specific measures he will take to fix our broken immigration system," the official said. "As the president has said previously, he is committed to taking action before the end of the year."

During his first term, Obama maintained that he didn't have the authority to take extensive immigration policy action on his own. But over the past year, as it became clear that Congress was hopelessly deadlocked on the issue, the president and his advisers decided they did, in fact, have the authority to confer at least temporary legal status on some of those who are in the U.S. illegally. Republicans in Congress, furious about the president's pending proposal and now with control of both chambers of Congress, have vowed to try to block Obama's executive action, possibly through their control of spending bills.

New Mexico Gov. Susana Martinez, a Republican, has also weighed in against Obama's executive action plan on immigration.

"This unilateral approach to a complex problem is not leadership," Martinez's spokesman, Enrique Carlos Knell, told the Journal last week.

"The president needs to work in earnest and in good faith with Congress to meaningfully address the immigration challenges our nation faces." Knell said. "Absent a bipartisan solution, long-term and sustainable solutions to this pressing issue will only be more difficult to reach. New Mexicans deserve better from this White House and this president."

Within New Mexico's congressional delegation, Reps. Steve Pearce, a Republican, and Ben Ray Luján, a Democrat, represent the far ends of opposition and support for the president's plan.

The delegation's other three Democrats' views fall somewhere in between, although in Journal interviews last week none of the three opposed outright the president's plan.

On Thursday, Luján attended a Capitol Hill press conference with about two-dozen other Democrats to drum up support for Obama's plan. Afterward, he told the Journal that if the Republican-led House won't pass immigration legislation already approved by the Senate then Obama should take unilateral action.

"We are collectively asking and encouraging President Obama to be bold and use the full extent of his executive authority to do what's right for millions of immigrants here in the United States," Luján said. "We were very clear that families can no longer wait for House Republicans to act."

Luján stressed that U.S. presidents have long used their executive powers to change immigration policy, so Obama would not be the first.

Pearce described the expected presidential action as unconstitutional, arguing that it is unfair to effectively grant legal status to lawbreakers and their children when others are seeking to legitimize their presence in the U.S. through established channels.

"I don't think he's got the constitutional right to do it," Pearce said. "It's a question of the constitutionality and a question of what is fair to the American people and to the actual immigrants. The question here is, No. 1, is it constitutional, and is it fair to the immigrants who are doing it properly and it is fair to American workers and taxpayers?"

Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., said House Republicans who oppose Obama's plan to take executive action could avert it by passing a Senate bill approved last year. That bill includes a so-called "path to citizenship" for about 12 million people now in the U.S. illegally, as well as significant improvements to the nation's border security apparatus.

"If the House won't act, I believe President Obama will be justified in taking executive action to fix our broken immigration system as much as he can under existing law," Udall said in an interview.

"I would support action that focused limited resources on securing the border and deporting criminals and those who are a threat to our country," Udall said. "I would also support a targeted action to provide temporary legal status for some people who have been living, working and raising families for many years in this country, for whom deportation would be a hardship and pose no threat to our communities."

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, a Democrat, said she is also frustrated that Congress hasn't been able to resolve the issue. She said she can "understand" why the president would want to take immigration action on his own but fretted that it would lead to more tension among Democrats and Republicans in Congress.

"This is a decades-old problem for us, and we want it to be addressed," Lujan Grisham said. "I understand (why the president is mulling executive action). I don't think it helps us get to comprehensive immigration reform, but it does something meaningful for the five million who are living in shadows because they don't have sufficient protections right now."

"I would prefer we don't have an executive action and that we do it in Congress, but I respect the president's position here," the congresswoman added.

Sen. Martin Heinrich, a Democrat, was also less than enthusiastic about the president's looming - and politically sensitive - executive action. Like Udall and others, he said congressional action would be preferable.

"I understand and share New Mexicans' frustration with the lack of progress in passing comprehensive immigration reform," he said. "I support the president using his existing legal authority to address this issue, but whatever steps he takes will not be a replacement for congressional action."

Heinrich also lamented that actions Obama takes without consent of Congress could be reversed by a subsequent president.

"Anything that the White House does will lack the permanence of law, so it's always been my preference that we do this legislatively," Heinrich said. "It would be a much more elegant solution if we could pass legislation, because it would have permanence."

Heinrich and all other Democrats in New Mexico's congressional delegation have voiced support for legislation that would allow about 12 million immigrants now here illegally to legally remain in the U.S. as long as they had no serious criminal background, paid a fine, allowed their income to be taxed and formally applied for citizenship.

Pearce opposes that proposal, advocating for a greatly expanded guest worker program instead.

Fort Wingate bill referred back to committee

BYLINE: Kathy Helms navajo1@gallupindependent.com, DIN É BUREAU

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 6

LENGTH: 1001 words

DATELINE: WINDOW ROCK

WINDOW ROCK -- After hours of impassioned discussion, the Navajo Nation Council referred a resolution supporting the Fort Wingate Land Division back to the Resources and Development Committee for further research and discussion of Navajo claims regarding cultural resources.

Delegate Edmund Yazzie who has adamantly opposed the transfer, stated that Congress is using the land division as a carrot.

"You're using this to get what you want in the northern area. Just say that," Yazzie said, referring to the Navajo Exchange Legislative Initiative, or NELI project, which would consolidate most of the Bureau of Land Management lands in Eastern Navajo Agency and place them into trust.

"We can't give this land away," Yazzie said. "Our people were slaughtered and buried at Fort Wingate and we're going to have a Zuni Flag flying over it?"

He requested that they hear from the Department of Historic Preservation and the Navajo Nation Human Rights Commission.

"The Council needs to hear the other side," he said.

Delegate Danny Simpson, sponsor of the resolution, presented information on the bill, along with Ron Maldonado, acting Historic Preservation officer, and Larry Rodgers, who has been heading the Eastern Navajo Land Commission and is now on special assignment as chief of staff to Speaker Pro Tem LoRenzo Bates.

No Navajo input

Simpson said the land division was negotiated by the Navajo Nation and the Zuni Tribe in summer 2013. Yazzie and former Speaker Johnny Naize attended the negotiations in Washington along with two representatives from the Zuni Tribe. The negotiations were facilitated by U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Lujan Jr. and Steve Pearce of New Mexico and Rep. Don Young of Alaska.

Out of those negotiations emerged House Resolution 3822, a joint legislation between Lujan and Pearce, Simpson said. Lujan later requested a legislation from the Navajo Nation stating that it was in support of the negotiations that took place.

"Since we prolonged to get a resolution from the Navajo Nation, there was another resolution that was introduced by Congressman Stephen Pearce, HR5438. Now, that legislation is moving pretty quickly," Simpson said.

Because HR3822 was a joint resolution, Navajo had a lot of input regarding the incorporation of new language, he said.

"Delegate Leonard Tsosie went to Churchrock to talk to people from Iyanbito and Churchrock communities, and he expressed, 'What do you want in this legislation that's going before Congress?'" Simpson said. "Some of the things that came out of that meeting are incorporated in this (Navajo Nation) resolution."

When Pearce was told that Navajo had recommendations they wanted to incorporate into his resolution, Pearce told them, "You guys have to meet with the Zuni Tribe first before I consider these recommendations for the Navajo Nation," Simpson said.

"If we pass this resolution here, with our recommendation from the Nation, Congressman Lujan is willing to incorporate our recommendation into his joint legislation. If we don't have any recommendations from the Navajo Nation, basically, Congressman Pearce's legislation will go forward without a recommendation from the Nation until we get consensus from the Zuni Tribe," Simpson said.

Cultural resources

Maldonado was asked to elaborate on a letter submitted by Historic Preservation's Tim Benally which stated that more study is needed of Navajo cultural resources at Fort Wingate.

"It was brought to my attention by members of the staff of Congressman Lujan and Congressman (Martin) Heinrich last week that a memo had gone out from the Historic Preservation Department in October calling into question the adequacy of a previous ethnographic study that was done on Fort Wingate," Maldonado said.

A correction memo was handed out to Council, stating that there has been a long history of ethnographic work being done at Fort Wingate.

"The work that has been done over the last 20 years has been really good work. It identified a number of resources," Maldonado said. "It places in the control of the Navajo Nation three-quarters of all the known sacred sites."

There are 826 known cultural resources, the majority of them - a little over 500 - are Navajo sites that include corrals, sweat lodges, hogans, etc., he said.

"Once the land is relinquished to the tribes ... before the Department of the Interior can give up the land, they will have to do a resource management plan, essentially, which calls for more studies to be done," Maldonado said. "So each tribe will get an opportunity again to actually go out and do more studies and talk to the communities to find out if there are any resources that have been missed."

Fair division

Rodgers said that when Pearce first proposed the land division resolution, it would have given all of Parcel 1, 4,500 acres, to Zuni.

"There were a couple of small parcels, 15 and 17, that would be given to Navajo. That's what sparked a great deal of debate, especially from the Navajo Nation viewpoint," he said. "That particular land division as proposed by Pearce initially was not fair to the Navajo Nation when you compare 4,500 acres versus about 700-800 acres that would be given to Navajo."

The Nation took it upon itself to make sure there was a fair division, Rodgers said, adding, "The Zunis fought quite hard to get a 50-50 settlement."

If the resolutions sponsored by Lujan and Pearce are passed the way they are currently, "It really does not favor Navajo," Rodgers said. "So what needs to happen is we really need good, strong support from this Council to provide the recommendations that are contained in your resolution that is here today."

On Sept. 19, the Fort Wingate Task Force passed a number of amendments it asked Council to include in Simpson's resolution. One of the amendments would ensure that the access road that comes onto the headquarters at the Army Depot is used as a dividing line.

"Because there is going to be distrust between the two tribes, it's good to have a solid line as a boundary," Rodgers said.

Letter: Money tarnishes elections

SECTION: OPINION

LENGTH: 255 words

Editor:

Who really lost this election season?

Much post-election coverage has analyzed how and why candidates won or lost, but the biggest loser was the American public. A small cadre of large donors drowned out the voices of average citizens. In the Gubernatorial race it took only 6 large donors to outspend all 3,211 small donors of $250 or less and 74 percent of contributions came from individuals giving over $1,000.

In the wake of the Supreme Court's recent decisions undermining federal campaign finance rules, most notably Citizens United v FEC, New Mexico's elections have become increasingly flooded by large donations. In a democracy, the size of your wallet should not determine the volume of your voice; however the current system forces our elected officials to focus on a few large donors rather than the majority. It is not them at fault, but the system.

There are successful, proven models to empower small donors, so that their voices play a more central role in our democracy, such as providing tax credits and public matching funds for small donations. For example, in New York City's 2013 city council campaigns, small donors were responsible for 61 percent of participating candidates' contributions, when funds from a matching program are included.

I applaud our U.S. Reps. Michelle Lujan Grisham and Ben Ray Luján for taking action by supporting legislation to empower small donors and implore our local elected officials to take the lead right here in New Mexico.

House chief clerk to step down from $119K position after 31 years

BYLINE: Steve Terrell, The Santa Fe New Mexican

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 661 words

Nov. 13--Stephen Arias of Santa Fe, chief clerk of the New Mexico House of Representatives for the past 31 years, confirmed Wednesday that he will step down from the $118,874-a-year post.

His planned departure is the latest in a series of pending changes in the legislative chamber since last week's general election, in which Republicans won control of the House for the first time in more than six decades.

Outgoing House Republican floor leader Don Bratton of Hobbs told Arias on Monday that the GOP Caucus "has somebody else in mind for clerk," Arias said. Attempts to learn the name of the person the Republicans have in mind were unsuccessful Wednesday.

Arias began his career with the Legislature in the mid-1960s. "That was when the Capitol was in the old building," he said, referring to what is now known as the Bataan Memorial Building, located across Don Gaspar Avenue from the current Capitol.

Arias said he's the third-longest-serving legislative clerk in the country.

He said he started out as a reading clerk, but his actual duties were far more varied than simply reading bills during a floor session. Among them were taking legislators' coats and hanging them in the coat room, which was in an old safe, Arias said.

Before the 1983 session, Arias said, he decided to run for chief clerk and was elected to that position by the majority caucus.

Arias recalled that his predecessor was Al Romero. "I had to convince Al to run for state auditor, so I could run for clerk," Arias said.

Arias recalled that in early January of 1983, while he was busy taking charge of the clerk's office, writing a proposed budget and hiring staff, he called Rep. Raymond Sanchez, who had just been nominated by the Democratic Caucus for House speaker. Arias just had one question: "Should I be doing this?" He told Sanchez that he had not yet been confirmed as clerk by the full House, and Sanchez hadn't been formally confirmed as speaker.

"Has anyone said anything?" Sanchez asked. Arias said no. "Well, just keep doing it until someone says something," Sanchez replied.

Later that month, both Sanchez and Arias were confirmed without a hitch.

But two years later, Sanchez was ousted as speaker by a coalition of conservative Democrats and Republicans. Arias, however, remained as clerk under new Speaker Gene Samberson. When Sanchez returned as speaker in 1987, Arias again remained as clerk. And after Sanchez was defeated for re-election in 2000, Arias continued serving under subsequent speakers Ben Luján of Nambé and Kenny Martinez of Grants.

Arias recalled that when Speaker Luján's son, Ben Ray Luján, was elected to Congress in 2008, he reminded the elder Luján of President John F. Kennedy's words about about passing the torch to a new generation. (Arias noted that both he and Speaker Luján had been involved in the Young Democrats group in the 1960s.) And around this time, Arias began thinking it might be time for him to also move on.

"I might not have run for clerk [in 2013] had it been anyone but Kenny Martinez," Arias said. He recalled that he'd worked in the House with Martinez's father, former Speaker Walter Martinez.

Kenny Martinez announced this week that he won't seek any leadership role when the House reorganizes in January.

According to the state Sunshine Portal, Arias' salary makes him and his counterpart in the Senate, Lenore Naranjo, the highest paid employees in the legislative branch.

Arias is responsible for supervising 13 classified employees, though currently there are five vacant positions in the office. The total budget for his office this year was more than $1.1 million.

"It's been a wonderful experience," Arias said. "It's been a great tour."

LUJAN STATEMENT HONORING OUR VETERANS

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 434 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today in celebration of Veterans Day.

"In communities across this great nation, we gather to honor the service and sacrifice of the brave men and women who have protected our country and the values and ideals that we hold dear. As we celebrate Veterans Day, we remember the heroism and bravery of all those who wore our nation's uniform.

"In New Mexico, we have a long history of service. From the Navajo Code Talkers and the soldiers who endured the Bataan Death March in World War II to Medal of Honor recipients Leroy Petry and Hiroshi Miyamura, New Mexicans have fought bravely in many conflicts. While the theater of battle may have changed, their brave service and commitment to our country has always remained the same.

"President Kennedy said, "Let every nation know, whether it wishes us well or ill, that we shall pay any price, bear any burden, meet any hardship, support any friend, oppose any foe to assure the survival and the success of liberty.' Time and again our veterans have lived up to those words, enduring the hardships and making the sacrifices that have protected our nation and our values. And for that we owe them a debt of gratitude.

"This year will mark the 70th anniversary of the GI Bill that enabled veterans and military families to get a quality education and opened the door to the middle class for so many. It is an example of the commitment our country made to those who served and it is a reminder of the importance of providing for our veterans when they return home.

"We must thank our veterans not just in words, but in deeds. To honor our promises we must ensure veterans and their families receive the benefits they have earned. While we have taken important steps to right the wrongs at VA facilities that failed to provide the care our veterans deserve, we must remain vigilant to ensure that no more veterans fall through the cracks. And we must provide opportunities to our returning veterans. Despite the leadership, skills, and training they possess, too many veterans struggle to find work. From job training to incentives to hire veterans, we must invest in the men and women who served with distinction and have what it takes to be the business owners, entrepreneurs, and leaders in our communities.

"To all our veterans, thank you for your service and your sacrifice. And to all the men and women still serving in our Armed Forces, thank you, and we pray for your safe return home."

Column: Some families have politics in the gene pool

BYLINE: By Sherry Robinson, New Mexico News Services

SECTION: OPINION

LENGTH: 606 words

Political dynasties are a hot topic lately because of potential runs by a Bush or a Clinton. We have our share in New Mexico.

Take the two men competing for State Land Officer.

Incumbent Ray Powell Jr.'s father, a mechanical engineer, came to New Mexico in 1943 to work on the Manhattan Project and helped found Sandia National Laboratories. He retired in 1985, ran for governor and lost to Garrey Carruthers.

In 1963, when all state employees were political appointees, Gov. Jack Campbell assigned the senior Powell to develop and implement a state personnel system, which he did, with integrity and fairness. In 1988, Powell became state chairman of a Democratic Party fractured along geographical and ideological fault lines, which spawned coalition control of the Legislature. Under Powell's leadership, Democrats won majorities, and the coalitions ended.

When he died in 2010 at 90, columnist Jay Miller wrote, "New Mexico has lost one of its greatest public servants."

The younger Powell's opponent, Republican Aubrey L. Dunn, another junior, is the son of a legislative powerhouse.

Aubrey L. Dunn Sr., whose own father was a state senator in the 1940s, entered the Senate in 1964. As chairman of the Senate Education Committee, he pushed through the first public school equalization formula. For that, he was considered "a wide-eyed liberal," he once said. He became chairman of the Senate Finance Committee in 1973. He resigned from the Senate in 1979 and ran for governor but lost the Democratic primary to Toney Anaya. He died in 2012.

Dunn, a political reporter once wrote, "has the respect of most of those who get to know him or have to work with him whether they like him or not."

The Washington Post recently named the leading political dynasties in each state: in New Mexico, the Lujans, and in Arizona, the Udalls.

U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan is son of the late state Speaker of the House Ben Lujan. U.S. Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham's grandfather Eugene Lujan was the New Mexico Supreme Court's first Hispanic chief justice. Her uncle, Manuel Lujan, was a long-serving Republican congressman and U.S. Interior Secretary; Manuel's brother Ed was state Republican Party chairman; and their father was mayor of Santa Fe. Michelle and Ben Ray, both Democrats, are distantly related.

This year, the Udalls were much discussed nationally, as Democrats Tom and his cousin Mark fought to hold their Senate seats in New Mexico and Colorado. Tom is the son of former Interior Secretary Stewart Udall; Mark is the son of former congressman Mo Udall. In Arizona, the Udalls also count two mayors, four state legislators and two state Supreme Court justices.

And we have Walter K. Martinez, senior and junior, both state Speakers of the House.

The senior Martinez, born in Tierra Amarilla, moved to the uranium boomtown of Grants in the 1950s. He was elected to the state House in 1966 and served as speaker from 1971 to 1978. In 1981 he was the primary mover in creating Cibola County out of western Valencia County. He died in 1986.

Because Walter used to move his entire family to Santa Fe for the legislative session, young Ken Martinez spent a lot of time in the Roundhouse. He was elected to the House in 1998 and became speaker in 2013.

Walter Martinez "was not an ideologue. He operated by consensus and didn't dictate," said former UNM professor Noel Pugach. That's also a good description of Ken.

LUJAN HIGHLIGHTS $4.4 MILLION TO HELP NEW MEXICO SMALL BUSINESSES GROW;
Treasury Department Funds Support Economic Development; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 231 words

Santa Fe, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District highlighted federal funding from the U.S. Treasury Department today that will support small businesses by increasing access to capital. More than $4.4 million is going to the New Mexico Economic Development Department and the New Mexico Finance Authority through the State Small Business Credit Initiative (SSBCI). With the latest announcement, New Mexico has received a total of $13,168,350 through SSBCI.

"Access to credit is critical to the small businesses that drive our economy, and these federal funds will contribute to our efforts to promote economic growth and create good jobs in our communities," Congressman Lujan said. "By allowing states that receive these funds to continually reinvest them in the small business community, SSBCI's impact will be multiplied over time."

States that have received SSBCI funds have reported that more than 95,000 jobs will be created or saved due to SSBCI-supported loans and investments. SSBCI funding is not repaid by participating states to the federal government, and instead helps even more small businesses by allowing states to use repaid loans and investments to fund further economic development through additional loans.

The Republican governor, Susana Martinez, is poised to play a significant role in national politics after winning re-election against her Democratic challenger, Attorney General Gary King. Ms. Martinez, who became the nation's first Latina governor in 2010, gained prominence when the Republicans gave her a prime-time platform at their 2012 convention. New Mexico, with an electorate that is estimated to be about 35 percent Hispanic, is still suffering the effects of the Great Recession. Its unemployment rate remains well above the national average.

Senator Tom Udall, a Democrat, beat back a challenge from Allen Weh, the former state Republican Party chairman. Mr. Udall has a well-known political lineage: His father, Stewart Udall, was a former secretary of the interior, and the long-serving Representative Mo Udall, who died in 1998, was his uncle. New Mexico's three incumbent congressional representatives -- Michelle Lujan Grisham and Ben Ray Luján, both Democrats, and Steve Pearce, a Republican -- faced nominal challenges and won easily.

Democrats faced further bad news here, as preliminary results showed them losing control of the State Legislature for the first time since President Dwight D. Eisenhower's victory in 1952.

NM returns its full delegation to Congress; Incumbents easily fend off challengers

BYLINE: CHARLES D. BRUNT JOURNAL STAFF WRITER

SECTION: ELECTION 2014; Pg. A3

LENGTH: 924 words

New Mexico voters returned all four of the state's incumbent congressional candidates to Washington on Tuesday.

About an hour after the polls closed, KOAT-TV analyst and Journal pollster Brian Sanderoff declared all four winners of their respective races.

Incumbent Sen. Tom Udall had a 10 percent lead over Republican challenger Allen Weh - a narrower lead than earlier in the race. In the closing weeks, Weh sought to capitalize on voters' discontent with congressional gridlock and President Barack Obama's declining approval numbers.

At about midnight Tuesday, Udall had nearly 45,000 more votes than Weh, according to unofficial totals.

In New Mexico's 1st Congressional District, incumbent Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, an Albuquerque Democrat, was headed for a second term with a commanding lead over challenger Michael Frese.

In northern New Mexico's 3rd Congressional District, incumbent Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., held a 2-to-1 lead over Jefferson Byrd. It will be Lujan's fourth term in the House.

And in southern New Mexico, Rep. Steve Pearce, a Hobbs oil services business executive who is seeking a sixth term, easily outdistanced attorney Roxanne "Rocky" Lara, a Democrat from Carlsbad.

Udall vs. Weh

Udall, a Santa Fe Democrat seeking his second Senate term, is the senior member of New Mexico's congressional delegation. He dug deep into his sizable war chest in an effort to fend off Weh, a retired Marine Corps Reserve colonel and unapologetic conservative.

During his victory speech, Udall said, "As I travel our state, as I listen to New Mexicans, it's clear to me that there are great challenges and great opportunities. We have work to do, and we have work to do together."

He said he would "reach across the aisle to anybody to make a difference for New Mexico."

While serving in the U.S. House from 1999 to 2009, Udall - long popular with environmentalists and other left-leaning groups - consistently ranked among the more liberal members of that chamber. In his six years in the Senate, Udall has moderated his record and in 2013 was ranked the 32nd most liberal U.S. senator, out of 100, by the National Journal.

Weh said he was proud of his campaign, pointing to the fact that he started the race 22 points behind Udall.

"We offered people a clear choice," he said late Tuesday.

Weh, a former state Republican Party chairman, made an unsuccessful bid for governor in 2010, losing the primary to now-Gov. Susana Martinez.

1st Congressional District

Lujan Grisham was facing Republican challenger Michael Frese of Corrales, a scientist and owner of a small business that focuses on computer modeling experiments.

Shortly after the race was called in her favor, Lujan Grisham told supporters, "We took every voter seriously. We took nothing for granted. This is not a good climate for anyone in Congress and your first re-election is your worst."

She said she's hopeful that, with the Republican shift in Congress, there will be a new attitude in Washington that leads to a willingness on both sides to reach compromises and move the nation forward.

Frese, a relative newcomer to New Mexico politics, ran unsuccessfully for a seat on the Sandoval County Commission in 2012.

Lujan Grisham, a 12th-generation New Mexican who grew up in Los Alamos and Santa Fe, and now lives in Albuquerque, is a former Bernalillo County commissioner and state health department secretary.

2nd Congressional District

Pearce, a former state legislator and oil field services executive who describes himself as "unflinchingly conservative," won a commanding victory.

"I would like to thank my neighbors and the citizens of southern New Mexico for re-electing me to stand up for our values in Washington, D.C.," Pearce said Tuesday night. "I am eager to get back to work to tackle the many important challenges our state and country face," including government spending, immigration and increasing job opportunities for New Mexicans.

Pearce had held southern New Mexico's 2nd Congressional District seat for three consecutive terms, from 2003 through 2008, but then lost a bid for a statewide U.S. Senate seat. He regrouped and recaptured the House seat in 2010, and cruised to re-election in 2012.

Lara, who generally describes her political views as conservative on financial issues and liberal on social issues, campaigned unsuccessfully to serve as chairwoman of the New Mexico Democratic Party in 2013.

3rd Congressional District

Luján, a former New Mexico Public Regulation commissioner, faced Republican challenger Jefferson Byrd, a Harding County rancher who lost to Luján by 26 percentage points for the same seat in 2012.

Democrats outnumber Republicans by nearly 2 to 1 in that congressional district, which covers roughly the northern third of the state.

In a statement, Luján thanked his supporters, saying he was "humbled" by the trust they have put in him.

"... To solve the challenges that we face, we need to work together - from every level of government to the private sector," he said, adding that his priorities will continue to be jobs creation, supporting farmers and ranchers, promoting renewable resources and investing in education.

Luján's late father, Ben Lujan, was a Democratic speaker of the New Mexico House of Representatives.

A race-by-race look at the New Mexico election

BYLINE: The Associated Press

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL

LENGTH: 816 words

New Mexico voters chose more than a governor on Tuesday. They elected a new attorney general and decided to send four incumbents back to Congress. Some other top-ticket races were still too close to call Wednesday morning. Here's a race-by-race look at this year's election:

U.S. SENATE

Democratic U.S. Sen. Tom Udall won his second term with a victory over challenger Republican Allen Weh. A longtime businessman and retired Marine colonel, Weh managed to trim Udall's lead in recent weeks, but it wasn't enough to unseat the first-term senator. Udall is a popular former attorney general and congressman. Weh is a former state Republican Party chairman who came in second behind Gov. Susana Martinez in the governor's primary four years ago.

U.S. HOUSE

All three incumbents for New Mexico's congressional seats won re-election. In the 1st Congressional District that covers most of Albuquerque, Democrat Michelle Lujan Grisham held off a challenge by Republican Mike Frese, a 66-year-old scientist and small business owner from Corrales. For the 3rd District seat, Democratic incumbent Rep. Ben Ray Lujan beat Republican Jefferson Byrd of Tucumcari. In southern New Mexico, Rep. Steve Pearce fended off a feisty attack from Carlsbad attorney Roxanne "Rocky" Lara and national Democrats to keep his seat.

ATTORNEY GENERAL

State Auditor Hector Balderas, considered a rising star in the state Democratic Party, will be moving on to head up the state attorney general's office with a victory over Republican Susan Riedel, a former prosecutor and judge from Las Cruces. Balderas had stockpiled more money than any other statewide office candidates, except for Republican Gov. Susana Martinez.

LEGISLATURE

All 70 House seats were up for election this year, but there were only about three dozen contested races. Republicans were poised early Wednesday to potentially make history by riding the currents of national political discontent to their first legislative majority in 60 years. In early unofficial returns, the GOP was leading in enough races for a possible net gain of four seats in the state House. However, several contests remained very close. Democrats currently hold a 37-33 edge.

SECRETARY OF STATE

In one of the feistier races, Republican Secretary of State Dianna Duran won a second term by fending off a strong challenge from Democrat Maggie Toulouse Oliver. One of the major focuses of the race has been on voter ID. Duran hoped her push for new voter ID measures would put her over the top. Oliver said fraud is rare and requiring voters to have identification would just prevent certain residents from casting ballots.

LAND COMMISSIONER

New Mexico Land Commissioner Ray Powell is locked in a tight race with Republican challenger Aubrey Dunn. During Powell's tenure, the state Land Office has generated a record $2.3 billion for state accounts that pay for public schools, hospitals and other projects. Powell says he helped transform a "badly compromised and dysfunctional office" and has worked with oil and gas companies as well as renewable energy developers. But Dunn accuses him of "extreme environmentalism."

AUDITOR

New Mexico Sen. Timothy Keller has been elected state auditor. The Democrat defeated Republican lawyer Robert Aragon on Tuesday in a race that centered on how the auditor's office should monitor government waste. The Harvard Business School-educated Keller, currently the Senate majority whip, promised to uncover an estimated $900 million of unspent public money and redirect it to state programs. Aragon, a former Democrat and state lawmaker, had promised in his campaign ads to be the voters' "pit bull" in ferreting out corruption and fraud.

TREASURER

Democrat Tim Eichenberg defeated Republican Rick Lopez to replace state Treasurer James Lewis, who can't run again because of term limits. Eichenberg, a real estate agent and former state lawmaker, said the treasurer's office should invest more in New Mexico's infrastructure to help start construction projects and to create more jobs. He believes the state should acquire more federal lands that could then be leased to create a new revenue source for early childhood education.

PUBLIC REGULATION COMMISSION

The only contested seat on the New Mexico Public Regulation Commission is pitting a Republican incumbent against a former Democratic commissioner who was once the panel's chairman. Ben Hall is seeking re-election to his District 5 seat on the powerful commission that regulates public utilities, telecommunications and insurance companies. He is facing Democrat Sandy Jones.

BALLOT ISSUES

Voters in two of New Mexico's most populous counties appear to have endorsed non-binding referendums on decriminalizing marijuana. Unofficial election results showed voters in Santa Fe and Bernalillo counties approved both measures by wide margins. The counties, however, won't be obligated to follow voters' final decision.

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) - Democratic U.S. Sen. Tom Udall won a second term Tuesday despite attempts by Republican challenger Allen Weh to link the popular politician to public displeasure with President Barack Obama and his policies, including the health-care overhaul.

A former attorney general and congressman, Udall had a sizable campaign fund and was favored by pollsters early on as one of a handful of Senate members who had a 99 percent chance of retaining his seat.

Weh, an Albuquerque businessman and retired Marine colonel, put up some of his personal fortune to launch an aggressive campaign. He made up ground in Democratic-leaning areas with only weeks remaining in the election, but it wasn't enough.

"This is a big victory, and I believe New Mexicans felt that I was focused on New Mexico, was working hard for New Mexico - and I think that's why they returned me to the Senate," Udall said.

In New Mexico's three congressional races, there were no surprises as the incumbents were able to hold off their challengers to win re-election.

While New Mexico's representation in the U.S. House will remain consistent, Udall acknowledged Tuesday night that he will now be in the minority. Republicans claimed the Senate majority for the first time in eight years, riding Obama's unpopularity to victories in every part of the country.

"I think this may open some opportunities up for us. I'm willing to reach across the aisle with anybody to help New Mexico out and to help the country out," Udall said.

In southern New Mexico, Republican Steve Pearce fended off a feisty challenge from Democrat Roxanne "Rocky" Lara to keep his seat in the 2nd District.

Despite attacks by immigrant-rights' groups and others, Pearce has remained popular among constituents in the district, which includes some of the state's most productive oil and gas wells and a sliver of the international border.

Pearce, a Vietnam veteran and former state lawmaker, held the congressional seat from 2003 to 2009 before being elected again in 2011.

A barrage of television advertisements by Lara accused Pearce of supporting cuts that would affect senior citizens. While critical of big government, Pearce challenged the accusation.

Lara's effort to unseat Pearce had help from the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. She was among 10 first-time Hispanic candidates vying for the House.

"This campaign was never about one person or one idea. This campaign was about fighting for the values and priorities that will move southern New Mexico and our country forward," she said.

In the 1st District that covers most of Albuquerque, Democrat Michelle Lujan Grisham won re-election with a victory over Republican Mike Frese, a 66-year-old scientist and small business owner from Corrales.

Grisham said throughout the campaign that the economy and jobs should be the focus. She touted her efforts to help preserve dozens of jobs at Kirtland Air Force Base and millions of dollars in grants for projects in New Mexico.

She also went to bat for veterans after investigators uncovered large-scale improprieties in the way Veteran Affairs hospitals and clinics around the country scheduled patients for appointments.

For the 3rd District seat, Democrat incumbent Rep. Ben Ray Lujan rolled to his fourth term with a win over Republican Jefferson Byrd of Tucumcari.

Lujan, vice chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, has said making New Mexico more competitive will be at the top of his list when he returns to Washington.

Byrd had criticized Lujan, saying promises he made to northern New Mexico residents have gone unfilled. He had pointed to the region's high unemployment rate, among other things.

Lujan said in a statement issued Tuesday night that people in New Mexico are like family.

"To solve the challenges that we face, we need to work together - from every level of government to the private sector," he said. "We all have a role to play and a responsibility to build a stronger New Mexico that lives up to the hopes and dreams of the people of our great state. And we can only be successful if we put our differences aside and come together as New Mexicans."

Candidates differ on Ebola travel bans; Both Canada and Australia have stopped distributing travel visas

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: METRO & NEW MEXICO; Pg. C1

LENGTH: 473 words

WASHINGTON - Members of the New Mexico congressional delegation - and their challengers in today's election - voiced different opinions on whether the United States should stop issuing visas to travelers from African countries battling Ebola.

Last week, Canada followed Australia's lead and stopped distributing travel visas, effective immediately, to people from three West African countries battling Ebola: Guinea, Sierra Leone and Liberia.

Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., said he would support an Ebola-related ban on visas in the United States only if it were recommended by experts.

"I would support travel restrictions in the United States that are based on the recommendations of the top experts in infectious diseases, but I strongly believe that those decisions must be free from political interference and posturing," Udall told the Journal.

Allen Weh, Udall's Republican challenger, said he would support a travel ban similar to those imposed by Australia and Canada.

"I say let's err on the side of caution," Weh said. "There are too many unknowns, and nobody seems to have their arms around this thing. A temporary suspension of visas is not a bad thing."

Sen. Martin Heinrich, a New Mexico Democrat who is not up for re-election, said he is skeptical of such bans.

"Travel restrictions will not stop the spread of Ebola," Heinrich said. "Conversely, they will exacerbate the crisis in West Africa and hinder our ability to contain the virus by discouraging travelers from being forthcoming about their travel histories and potential exposure."

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., a former New Mexico health secretary, also voiced doubt.

"I am monitoring developments in West Africa, along with recommendations from the CDC and other public health experts who believe that travel bans could impede aid efforts and make it harder to trace individuals who enter the U.S.," she said.

Mike Frese, Lujan Grisham's Republican challenger, said he supports travel restrictions from the countries in question, as well as a temporary quarantine of health workers for U.S. medical personnel battling Ebola in Africa.

"We cannot afford to let Ebola get a foothold here, so we should impose some form of restrictions on travel, whether direct or indirect, from the impacted countries of Guinea, Liberia and Sierra Leone," Frese said.

Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., could not be reached for comment Monday. His Republican challenger, Jeff Byrd, said he would support a visa ban.

"While it is important to acknowledge the disruption to business and family relations, the general health and safety of the population is of higher importance, and therefore we support a travel ban for the general public traveling to these countries," Byrd said.

Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., could not be reached for comment Monday, nor could his Democratic challenger, Roxanne "Rocky" Lara.

A race-by-race look at the New Mexico election

BYLINE: The Associated Press

SECTION: POLITICAL NEWS

LENGTH: 915 words

New Mexico voters are choosing more than a governor this election. They're electing a new attorney general and deciding whether Democrats will retain control of a U.S. Senate seat and the statehouse. A race-by-race look at this year's election:

U.S. SENATE

Democratic U.S. Sen. Tom Udall is seeking his second term, and with a sizeable campaign fund, he has been working to fend off challenger Republican Allen Weh. A longtime businessman and retired Marine colonel, Weh managed to trim Udall's lead in recent weeks. Udall is a popular former attorney general and congressman. Weh is a former state Republican Party chairman who came in second behind Gov. Susana Martinez in the governor's primary four years ago.

U.S. HOUSE

All three incumbents for New Mexico's congressional seats are running for re-election. In the 1st Congressional District that covers most of Albuquerque, Democrat Michelle Lujan Grisham is being challenged in her bid for a second term by Republican Mike Frese, a 66-year-old scientist and small business owner from Corrales. For the 3rd Congressional District seat, Democratic three-term incumbent Rep. Ben Ray Lujan is being challenged for a second time by Republican Jefferson Byrd of Tucumcari. In southern New Mexico, national Democrats have worked to help Carlsbad attorney Roxanne "Rocky" Laura in her bid to unseat 2nd District Rep. Steve Pearce, who held the seat from 2003 to 2009, and most recently since 2011.

ATTORNEY GENERAL

State auditor Hector Balderas, considered a rising star in the state Democratic Party, held a large campaign cash advantage over Republican Susan Riedel in the race for attorney general. Balderas stockpiled more money than any other statewide office candidates, except for Republican Gov. Susana Martinez. Balderas and Riedel are seeking the post being vacated by Gary King, who is attempting to unseat Martinez. Riedel is a former prosecutor and judge from Las Cruces.

LEGISLATURE

All 70 House seats are up for election this year, but there are only about three dozen contested races. Republicans are hoping they can pick up enough seats to take control of the House for the first time in 60 years. Democrats hold a 37-33 advantage in the House. Democrats have a 25-17 majority in the Senate, and senators don't run for election until 2016.

SECRETARY OF STATE

One of the feistier races is between Republican Secretary of State Dianna Duran and Democratic Bernalillo County Clerk Maggie Toulouse Oliver. One of the major focuses has been on voter ID. Duran, who is seeking to become the first Republican re-elected to the seat in decades, hopes her push for new voter ID measures puts her over the top. Citing fraud concerns, she said new laws were needed to preserve the integrity of the election process. Oliver, Bernalillo County's clerk, said fraud is rare and requiring voters to have identification would just prevent certain residents from casting ballots.

LAND COMMISSIONER

New Mexico Land Commissioner Ray Powell is locked in a tight race with Republican challenger Aubrey Dunn. During Powell's tenure, the state Land Office has generated a record $2.3 billion for state accounts that fund public schools, hospitals and other projects. Powell says he helped transform a "badly compromised and dysfunctional office" and has worked with oil and gas companies as well as renewable energy developers. But Dunn accuses him of "extreme environmentalism."

AUDITOR

Democrat state Sen. Tim Keller is squaring off against Republican lawyer Robert Aragon to replace State Auditor Hector Balderas. Unpaid tax bills, a barking dog and even "Breaking Bad" references have made their way into what is typically a sleepy race. The Harvard Business School-educated Keller, currently the Senate majority whip, is promising to uncover an estimated $900 million of unspent public money and redirect it to state programs. Aragon, a former Democrat and state lawmaker, has promised in his campaign ads to be the voters' "pit bull" in ferreting out corruption and fraud.

TREASURER

Democrat Tim Eichenberg is going against Republican Rick Lopez in a race to replace state Treasurer James Lewis, who can't run again because of term limits. Eichenberg, a real estate agent and former state lawmaker, said the state should acquire more federal lands that could then be leased to create a new revenue source for early childhood education at a time when advocates are demanding more funding for early childhood programs. Lopez, a former state and federal government employee, promised to oppose any proposal to increase the amount of money distributed annually from the Land Grant Permanent Fund to expand early childhood programs, something Eichenberg says he's also against.

PUBLIC REGULATION COMMISSION

The only contested seat on the New Mexico Public Regulation Commission is pitting a Republican incumbent against a former Democratic commissioner who was once the panel's chairman. Ben Hall is seeking re-election to his District 5 seat on the powerful commission that regulates public utilities, telecommunications and insurance companies. He is facing Democrat Sandy Jones.

BALLOT ISSUES

Ballot measures covering issues such as school elections and state investments are being decided, but a pair of non-binding referendums in two of the state's most populous counties may get the most attention. Santa Fe and Bernalillo counties are asking voters whether they support marijuana decriminalization efforts in what will be a sign of residents' take on the pot debate.

Voters Guide: New Mexico takes to the polls for Election Day

BYLINE: David Lynch

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 1

LENGTH: 1007 words

Today is Election Day, and for those planning to vote, The Daily Lobo has compiled the latest updates on the major races. In addition, there are briefs of the state and county bond questions, as well as the advisory questions that will be on the ballot.

Governor race

The latest polling numbers compiled by The Albuquerque Journal show Gov. Susana Martinez, a Republican, with a fairly comfortable 15 percent lead on Democratic challenger Gary King.

Latinos, however, are swaying in King's favor, giving him a 50 to 42 percent lead in that demographic.

Martinez has said it is important to her that New Mexico expands its economy by looking at business out of state and inviting them in. King, meanwhile, said he would focus on New Mexico's small businesses for job creation.

Concerning education, King said he opposes standardized testing and advocates putting the responsibility in the teacher's hands. To the contrary, Martinez said teachers should be kept on a shorter leash and that they should be evaluated frequently.

John Sanchez, the current lieutenant governor, is Martinez's running mate, while Deb Haaland is the Democratic hopeful.

Federal races

The Senate race is a much closer one, with the latest data by the Journal showing a 7 percentage point advantage for Democratic incumbent Tom Udall over Republican challenger Allen Weh.

According to Weh's website, he supports less government regulation of businesses, being an entrepreneur himself. In addition, Weh said he advocates exploring New Mexico's natural resources without burdening taxpayers.

Udall said he's an advocate for diversifying transportation in the state, especially when it comes to high-speed railways. He also says he supports further securing the border and fairer immigration laws.

For the House of Representatives, Democrat Michelle Lujan Grisham runs for re-election against Republican Mike Frese in the First Congressional District; Republican incumbent Steve Pearce competes against Roxanne Lara in the Second District, covering southern New Mexico; and Democrat Rep. Ben Ray Lujan runs against Jeff Byrd in northern New Mexico's Third Congressional District.

Statewide races

Other races for New Mexico positions include Republican incumbent Dianna Duran against Democrat Maggie Toulouse Oliver for secretary of state; Democrat Hector Balderas against Republican Susan Riedel for attorney general; Republican Robert Aragon against Democrat Tim Keller for state auditor; Democrat Tim Eichenberg against Republican Rick Lopez for state treasurer; Democrat Ray Powell against Republican Aubrey Dunn for land commissioner.

All 70 state House of Representative positions will be decided, and 34 are contested races.

State and County GO Bond Questions

General obligation bonds are ways for the government to raise money for public works that don't raise revenue. Most of the raised money would come via taxes. State bonds B and C are especially important to UNM.

State Bond Question A

If passed, $17 million will be spent on improving retirement homes across New Mexico. $742,000 will be allocated to facilities in Albuquerque.

State Bond Question B

If passed, $11 million will be spent on improvements to libraries in the state. $805,662 will go to libraries on UNM's main campus.

State Bond Question C

If passed, $141 million will be spent on various improvements at colleges throughout the state. UNM in particular would receive $39 million, which would go primarily towards renovating the Farris Engineering Building and the construction of a new health education building.

County Bond Question 1

If passed, $1.8 million will go towards updating library resources in Bernalillo County.

County Bond Question 2

If passed, $5.74 million will be spent on the construction and improvement of general public safety facilities, including a new 7,000 square foot animal shelter.

County Bond Question 3

If passed, $6.46 million will be spent on building new parks and recreation facilities, and improving old ones. The projects include a new otter exhibit at the Albuquerque BioPark, new baseball fields, and renovations to various community centers.

County Bond Question 4

If passed, $9.07 million will be spent on improving roads in Albuquerque. In addition, $500,000 from the bond will go toward the development of a new trail connecting the Bosque and Chris Chavez Trails.

County Bond Question 5

If passed, $4.5 million will be spent on storm drainage and sewage facilities.

Mill Levy Question

If passed, a property tax of 0.2 percent will be put in place to assist the Open Space program. The Open Space program prioritizes saving naturally and culturally significant areas in Albuquerque. The raised money would go toward furthering natural education in the county.

Advisory Question 1

Voters are being asked their opinion on whether or not they support the decriminalization of possessing one ounce or less of marijuana. Currently the penalty for a first offense is a $50 fine and up to two weeks in jail. The advisory question asks for the maximum penalty for possession of an ounce or less to be changed to a $25 ticket.

This is just an advisory question, meaning that voters are simply being asked their opinion. The vote by itself will not have the power to change the law, it will simply tell lawmakers the will of the people.

If a large number of voters are in favor of decriminalization, the Bernalillo County Commission will look into supporting efforts of decriminalization. If a large number vote not in favor, no immediate attention will be placed on the issue.

Advisory Question 2

Voters are being asked their opinion over whether a 1/8 percent sales tax should be put in place to boost efforts to provide more mental and behavioral health services in the area.

Like the first advisory question, voters are not approving or disapproving of any immediate action. The Bernalillo County Commission is getting an idea of whether they should pursue such action or not.

Some families have politics in gene pool

BYLINE: Sherry Robinson

SECTION: COLUMNS

LENGTH: 623 words

Political dynasties are a hot topic lately because of potential runs by a Bush or a Clinton. We have our share in New Mexico.

In this election cycle, we heard most often about the King family, but other candidates (at this writing we don't know who prevailed) grew up with politics in their Cheerios.

Take the two men competing for state land officer.

Incumbent Ray Powell Jr.'s father, a mechanical engineer, came to New Mexico in 1943 to work on the Manhattan Project and helped found Sandia National Laboratories. He retired in 1985, ran for governor and lost to Garrey Carruthers.

In 1963, when all state employees were political appointees, Gov. Jack Campbell assigned Powell to develop and implement a state personnel system, which he did, with integrity and fairness. In 1988, Powell became state chairman of a Democratic Party fractured along geographical and ideological fault lines, which spawned coalition control of the Legislature. Under Powell's leadership, Democrats won majorities, and the coalitions ended.

When he died in 2010 at 90, columnist Jay Miller wrote, "New Mexico has lost one of its greatest public servants."

Powell's opponent, Republican Aubrey L. Dunn, another junior, is the son of a legislative powerhouse.

Aubrey L. Dunn Sr., whose own father was a state senator in the 1940s, entered the Senate in 1964. As chairman of the Senate Education Committee, he pushed through the first public school equalization formula. For that, he was considered "a wide-eyed liberal," he once said. He became chairman of the Senate Finance Committee in 1973. He resigned from the Senate in 1979 and ran for governor but lost the Democratic primary to Toney Anaya. He died in 2012.

Dunn, a political reporter once wrote, "has the respect of most of those who get to know him or have to work with him -- whether they like him or not."

The Washington Post recently named the leading political dynasties in each state: in New Mexico, the Lujáns, and in Arizona, the Udalls.

U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján is son of the late state Speaker of the House Ben Luján. U.S. Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham's grandfather Eugene Lujan was the New Mexico Supreme Court's first Hispanic chief justice. Her uncle, Manuel Luján, was a long-serving Republican congressman and U.S. Interior Secretary; Manuel's brother Ed was state Republican Party chairman; and their father was mayor of Santa Fe. Michelle and Ben Ray, both Democrats, are distantly related.

This year, the Udalls were much discussed nationally, as Democrats Tom and his cousin Mark fought to hold their Senate seats in New Mexico and Colorado. Tom is the son of former Interior Secretary Stewart Udall; Mark is the son of former congressman Mo Udall. In Arizona, the Udalls also count two mayors, four state legislators and two state Supreme Court justices.

And we have Walter K. Martinez, senior and junior, both state Speakers of the House.

The senior Martinez, born in Tierra Amarilla, moved to the uranium boomtown of Grants in the 1950s. He was elected to the state House in 1966 and served as speaker from 1971 to 1978. He also led the Mama Lucy Gang, a group of liberal Democrats who met in a Las Vegas eatery of that name. In 1981, he was the primary mover in creating Cibola County out of western Valencia County. He died in 1986.

Because Walter used to move his entire family to Santa Fe for the legislative session, young Ken Martinez spent a lot of time in the Roundhouse. He was elected to the House in 1998 and became speaker in 2013.

Walter Martinez was "very likable, soft spoken, and mild mannered," said former University of New Mexico professor Noel Pugach. "He was not an ideologue. He operated by consensus and didn't dictate." That's also a good description of Ken.

New Mexico voters to choose elected officials

BYLINE: Steve Terrell, The Santa Fe New Mexican

SECTION: NATIONAL POLITICAL NEWS

LENGTH: 733 words

Nov. 04--After Tuesday, the constant bombardment of political campaign advertising will cease and make way for pre-Christmas sales pitches.

Voters will elect a governor -- Republican incumbent Susana Martinez or Democratic challenger Gary King -- as well as a U.S. senator -- incumbent Democrat Tom Udall or GOP candidate Allen Weh.

Martinez campaigned in Southern New Mexico on the eve of Tuesday's general election, with stops in Hatch, Sunland Park and Mesilla wrapping up a 17-city tour that began last week.

King visited senior citizen centers in Santa Fe before heading to the party stronghold of Espanola in Northern New Mexico and to Albuquerque for a stop at a labor union headquarters, where supporters operated a phone bank to call voters.

The Democrat received last-minute assistance from former President Bill Clinton, who recorded a message that King's campaign used in automated phone calls to voters. Clinton met King's father, the late Bruce King, in the late 1970s, when the elder King was New Mexico governor and Clinton was a state official in Arkansas.

All three of New Mexico's seats in the U.S. House of Representatives are on the ballot. In Santa Fe and the rest of Northern New Mexico, voters will chose between incumbent Democrat Ben Ray Lujan or Republican Jefferson Byrd. In the Albuquerque-based 1st Congressional District, incumbent Democrat Michelle LujanGrisham is running against Republican Mike Frese. And in the Southern New Mexico District 2, incumbent Republican Steve Pearce faces Democratic challenger Rocky Lara.

All statewide elected offices are contested this year.

The two most hotly contested are the secretary of state's race, in which incumbent Republican Dianna Duran is running against Democratic opponent Maggie Toulouse Oliver, and the state land commissioner contest, which pits incumbent Democrat Ray Powell, Jr. against the GOP's Aubrey Dunn Jr.

Voters also will elect a state attorney general, a race in which Democrat Hector Balderas is running against Republican Susan Riedel; state auditor, where Democrat Tim Keller is running against Republican Robert Aragon; and state treasurer, in which Democrat Tim Eichenberg faces Republican Rick Lopez.

Also up for election is the entire House of Representatives. Several constitutional amendments and bond issues also are on the ballot.

According to unofficial early and absentee voting results on the Secretary of State's website, 213,931 people voted at early voting stations in New Mexico this year. That's down slightly from the 215,113 early in-person votes cast statewide in 2010, when the last gubernatorial race took place.

But there was a big drop in absentee ballots this year compared with four years ago. In 2010, 88,848 people cast absentee ballots in New Mexico. As of Monday morning, 47,349 absentee ballots had been returned to county clerks across the state for this year's election. There are still 17,066 absentee ballots that were sent to voters but not yet returned. But even if every one of those ballots is returned, there would still be more than 24,000 fewer absentee ballots than there were in 2010.

Those with outstanding absentee ballots can return them to polling places today.

In Santa Fe County, 18,637 people voted early. That's down from 2010, when 21,137 people took advantage of early voting in the county. This could be seen as a bad sign for Democrats because Santa Fe is a heavily Democratic county. As for absentee ballots, 4,784 people have returned absentee ballots so far. As of Monday morning, 1,866 absentee ballots were still out.

New Mexico's largest county, Bernalillo, actually beat its 2010 early voting figure. In that county, which includes Albuquerque, 84,351 people voted early, which is 3,537 more than four years ago. By Monday morning, 19,856 absentee ballots had been returned in Bernalillo County, with 9,206 yet to be returned. In 2010, about a third of the total votes cast in New Mexico were in Bernalillo County.

In 2010, almost half the total votes cast in that election came from early and absentee ballots.

RECKONING COMES FOR LONG NM BALLOT;
Voter turnout will likely be key in some close races, analysts say

BYLINE: DAN BOYD JOURNAL CAPITOL BUREAU

LENGTH: 1778 words

SANTA FE - Gov. Susana Martinez has kept a big lead over Attorney General Gary King in the New Mexico governor contest, but some close races up and down the ballot could make for a suspenseful Tuesday night.

Incumbent U.S. Sen. Tom Udall, a Democrat, is trying to rebuff a bid from Republican Allen Weh in the top slot on the general election ballot. Udall had a seven-point lead in the final Journal Poll on the race in late October, after Weh had cut into the incumbent's even larger advantage early on.

With voters set to go to Election Day polls on Tuesday - more than 231,000 had already cast ballots via early and absentee voting by the end of Friday - political analysts say voter participation levels will likely be key to several outcomes.

"It really comes down to turnout to me," said Gabriel Sanchez, a University of New Mexico political science professor.

Longtime New Mexico political analyst Brian Sanderoff said turnout is generally lower in non-presidential election years - like this year's - because, among other reasons, many younger registered voters do not go to the polls.

That trend, along with a national "mood" that may favor Republicans, has largely put Democrats on the defensive in 2014, Sanderoff said.

Land Commissioner Ray Powell, a Democrat who has held the job for more years than anyone in state history, has faced a stiff challenge from Republican Aubrey Dunn.

And Republicans are vying for control of the state House of Representatives, where Democrats have held a majority for the past 60 years and now have a fragile 37-33 advantage.

At least one Democrat appeared to be in the driver's seat in a contest for statewide office, according to Journal polling: Hector Balderas led Republican Susan Riedel in the race for state attorney general.

In the secretary of state contest, a recent Journal Poll found Dianna Duran, the Republican incumbent, in a dead heat with Democratic challenger Maggie Toulouse Oliver.

Meanwhile, voters were set to decide open-seat contests for state auditor and treasurer, with Democrat Tim Keller squaring off against Republican Robert Aragon in the auditor's race and Rick Lopez, a Republican, running against Democrat Tim Eichenberg in the treasurer's race.

"This year is defined at least partially by the fact that a lot of these low-profile, down-ballot races are in play," Sanderoff said. "I don't recall a year in which the Republicans had more potential to gain in (those) races."

New Mexico voters, who started casting absentee ballots Oct. 7, face a lengthy list of other candidates and questions, including five proposed constitutional amendments and three state bond questions that would authorize $169 million in construction and building repairs. Additional candidates and question are lined up on ballots in New Mexico's 33 counties.

In Bernalillo County, for example, voters face "advisory" questions about marijuana decriminalization, and taxes for new mental and behavioral health programs in Bernalillo County.

On the trail

In the final days of the governor campaign, Martinez, the Republican incumbent, traveled the state on a 17-stop bus tour, taking pictures and signing autographs for supporters.

At a stop in Española, a traditional Democratic stronghold, Martinez was greeted with "Vamos con Susana" signs by backers who themselves often called her by her first name.

"She's been a good governor," said Medardo Sanchez, who traveled from his home near Tierra Amarilla for the event. "When she took office, the state was in shambles."

King, the Democratic nominee, former state legislator and two-term attorney general, sounded a still-confident tone at campaign events of his own, despite an Oct. 21-23 Journal Poll that found him trailing Martinez by a 53 percent to 38 percent margin.

At an Albuquerque senior center, King chatted with voters about campaign issues and the legacy of his famous father, the late three-term Gov. Bruce King.

That came after King made several stops in Indian country, including a speech to the Acoma Pueblo Tribal Council.

Martinez had significantly outspent and out-fundraised King, spending more than $2.4 million on her re-election bid during a three-week time period leading up to Election Day. King spent $363,245 during that same time period, mostly on TV and radio ads.

While Martinez was readying to embark on her bus tour, her re-election campaign was still taking no prisoners, sending out hard-hitting mailers after a long stretch of TV ads attacking King.

The incumbent governor got help from high-profile GOP figures like New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie, who made two trips to New Mexico, and 2012 Republican presidential nominee Mitt Romney, who also came to the state.

"The Martinez campaign strategy from day one was to keep the race from being seen as competitive," Sanderoff said.

King's bid to unseat Martinez has been complicated by internal tumult - he has had three different campaign managers since the June primary election - and a lack of support from deep-pocketed national Democratic groups.

King went more than a month during the build-up to the general election without airing a TV campaign ad and many of Martinez's attack spots went unanswered.

"Gary King was sort of out there on his own," Sanderoff said. "In a sense, he never got off the ground."

Congress races

The U.S. Senate race in New Mexico played out with little intercession from outside groups.

Third-party groups were a major factor this year in Senate races in other states where political analysts believed Republicans might win new seats and help the GOP regain control of the Senate.

But the race between Udall, seeking his first Senate reelection, and Weh, a business owner and retired Marine Reserve colonel, stepped up in the final week of the campaign after a Journal Poll showed Udall's lead had narrowed.

Both Weh and Udall were active in TV advertising attacks over the month of October. But the candidates did not meet face to face for their first debate until last week, with days to go before Election Day.

In the state's three congressional elections, incumbent U.S. Reps. Michelle Lujan Grisham and Ben Ray Lujan, both Democrats, appeared to hold advantages over opponents in cash and campaign organizations. Lujan Grisham was facing off against Republican Mike Frese in the Albuquerque-based 1st Congressional District, while GOP candidate Jeff Byrd was running against Lujan in the state's northernmost 3rd Congressional District.

In southern New Mexico's 2nd Congressional District, national Democratic support for challenger Roxanne "Rocky" Lara bolstered her bid against Republican incumbent Steve Pearce in a conservative-leaning district that Democrats had cast aside in past elections.

On the line

In statewide races, Republicans were hoping Martinez could lead them to a historic breakthrough in a state long dominated by Democrats.

The last time a Republican won election to the Governor's Office and more than one other GOP candidate was voted into a statewide, non-congressional seat was 1986.

In that year, Garrey Carruthers was elected governor, Hal Stratton was elected attorney general and Bill Humphries was elected commissioner of public lands.

Some pundits have said that Martinez, the nation's first Hispanic female governor, could have a "coattail" effect and boost vote levels for fellow GOP candidates, especially those listed near her on the ballot.

House Speaker Ken Martinez, D-Grants, said he doesn't subscribe to the theory.

"I'm not a believer in this supposed coattail effect," Martinez told the Journal. "It seems to me the New Mexico electorate is pretty smart about picking and choosing."

While New Mexico voters used to have the option of selecting all candidates from one party - a straight-party vote - Duran eliminated the decades-old option in 2012, saying it was not allowed by state law.

Legislature

In the battle for control of the state House, lawmakers from both political parties have identified roughly 10 races that will end up determining which party controls the chamber entering the 2015 legislative session.

Democrats currently hold a narrow 37-33 majority, with all 70 House seats up for election.

House Speaker Martinez, who spent time in recent weeks knocking on doors with Democratic candidates in a handful of key swing districts, said he's optimistic going into Election Day.

"I think we'll maintain the House," Martinez told the Journal. "We've been working to keep the Democratic majority since the last election."

He also downplayed the possibility of a 35-35 tie, which could result in a rare power-sharing agreement between the two parties.

"I doubt there will be a tie, just looking at the numbers," Martinez said. "But if there was a tie, we'd rise to the occasion on both sides of the aisle."

House Minority Whip Nate Gentry, R-Albuquerque, who has faced a barrage of hard-hitting attacks in his own race for re-election in House District 30, said he thinks Republicans can seize control for the first time since 1954 - when Dwight Eisenhower was president.

"I think we have a real shot here," said Gentry, who predicted several races could be determined by razor-thin margins.

Gentry said voter patterns this year strongly resemble 2010, a year in which Republicans gained eight House seats.

Democrats responded by picking up seats in the 2012 election but, as a result, are in the position of having to defend their gains this time around.

"There are more Democratic seats in play that are vulnerable this year," Sanderoff said.

Members of the state Senate, which is also Democrat-controlled, serve four-year terms and are not up for re-election this year.

Factors

In the 2010 general election, the most recent statewide, non-presidential election, a total of 607,700 New Mexicans voted - or roughly 52.7 percent of registered voters.

UNM professor Sanchez said he believes voter turnout this year will likely be down from 2010 levels, while also warning that some voters might not cast votes on all races, due to the ballot's length. That could end up impacting certain down-ballot races.

"This is a longer ballot than usual, especially in a non-presidential year," he said.

Meanwhile, the run-up to Election Day has seen a final flurry of attack ads, mailers and traditional door-to-door canvassing, and millions of dollars - much of it from out-of-state donors - have flowed into state races.

"I think a lot of people are characterizing this year's races as more mudslinging than usual, but I just think it's a sign of the times," Sanchez said.

In election's last stretch, Democrats reach out to northern Hispanics

BYLINE: Steve Terrell, The Santa Fe New Mexican

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 1001 words

Nov. 02--LAS VEGAS, N.M. -- It was the last Saturday before the 2014 general election, and the 150 or so Democrats who had gathered in the cavernous hall adjoining Charlie's Spic and Span Bakery and Cafe were enthusiastic. They came to eat green chile stew and posole at the popular restaurant and to cheer their own candidates, who heaped praise on one another and gleefully bashed the Republicans.

Some speakers also made appeals to Hispanic solidarity, which normally helps Democrats in Northern New Mexico but shows serious signs of softening in the current election, especially in the bitterly fought gubernatorial race between incumbent Republican Gov. Susana Martinez and Democrat Gary King, who has served as attorney general for nearly eight years.

Nearly all the Democrats' statewide ticket was there, including U.S. Sen. Tom Udall, who is facing Republican Allen Weh.

San Miguel Democratic Party Chairman Martin Suazo, who introduced the speakers, touched on one big problem New Mexico Democrats are facing this year. In several races, Democrats with Anglo surnames are up against Hispanic Republicans. "They want you to know they're Hispanic, but they don't want you to know they're Republican," Suazo said.

Whether or not that's true, the GOP is drawing more Hispanic support than usual this year. An Albuquerque Journal poll last week showed Martinez taking 40 percent of the Hispanic vote in her race against King. And some believe incumbent Republican Secretary of State Dianna Duran's Hispanic name is helping her against her Democratic opponent, Maggie Toulouse Oliver.

Shoring up the northern Hispanic vote probably is a big reason the Democrats spent the crucial last Saturday of the campaign in Las Vegas and Mora, where a similar event was planned later Saturday.

U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, who gave the most rousing speech of the day, used ethnic pride as a rallying cry during his time on stage. He didn't even mention his own opponent, Republican rancher Jeff Byrd, whom he easily defeated two years ago. Instead, Luján concentrated on Martinez. He brought up a 2010 conversation that was caught on tape and released earlier this year in a blistering article about Martinez in Mother Jones magazine. In that tape, Matt Kennicott, then a campaign aide and now a spokesman for the Human Services Department, said Luján's late father, former state House Speaker Ben Luján, was eloquent in Spanish, but when he spoke English, he sounded "like a ... retard."

After telling how his mother, Carmen Luján, had cried when that story broke, Luján said, "We don't let people make fun of the way we talk."

When some audience members booed the word "retard," Luján said. "Don't boo. Vote."

There was no doubt that the audience was charged up. Enthusiasm was on full display. As was some obvious wishful thinking.

"There is a momentum," said state Democratic Party Chairman Sam Bregman, wearing a big, black cowboy hat. "I don't care how much more money Gov. Martinez spends attacking Gary King. He's going to win on Tuesday!"

Despite the polls and the national pundits who have declared Martinez a safe bet to win re-election over King, Bregman's statement prompted wild applause. Even before Bregman's speech, a Las Vegas Democratic Party volunteer told a reporter he'd been helping with the party's phone bank effort, and "80 percent of the people I've called say they're voting for Gary," the man said. That would be a feat even in San Miguel County, in which Democrats outnumber Republicans 71 percent to 13 percent.

The general election battle for governor has seemed cruelly lopsided since right after the June primary. Martinez, whose campaign already had amassed millions, and the national Republican Governor's Association immediately began running attack ads against King. Though the national group's ads ceased after a few weeks, Martinez's campaign, under the direction of her political consultant, Jay McCleskey, has been relentless, bringing up decades-old votes from King's legislative career and criticisizing his performance as attorney general.

Not only was King unable to effectively fight back on the air because of his anemic fundraising, his campaign also was full of organizational problems. He went through three campaign managers and has been functioning without one since mid-September.

Some Democrats have worried that other candidates also could be affected by a blowout in the governor's race. Toulouse Oliver has been running neck and neck with Duran in the secretary of state's race. And incumbent state Land Commissioner Ray Powell Jr. is facing a tough challenge from rancher and Republican Aubrey Dunn Jr., who has been running scathing TV ads against Powell for about a month. Powell only recently began running ads of his own. Asked why he'd taken so long, Powell said Saturday it was due to a lack of campaign money. Then he joked, "I finally went to the plasma center enough times to get the money."

Besides the races mentioned above, voters also will vote on state attorney general, a race in which Democrat Hector Balderas is running against Republican Susan Riedel; state auditor (Democrat Tim Keller vs. Republican Robert Aragon); and state treasurer (Democrat Tim Eisenberg vs. Republican Rick Lopez).

Also up for election is the entire House of Representatives. Several constitutional amendments and bond issues also are on the ballot.

Saturday was the last day of early voting. According to figures on the secretary of state's website, as of Saturday morning, 186,959 people had cast ballots at early voting centers, while 43,826 absentee ballots had been received so far. In 2010, the last year in which there was a gubernatorial race, there were 215,113 early in-person votes cast, which was almost half the total votes cast in that election. In 2010, 88,848 people cast absentee ballots in the state.

UDALL, HEINRICH, LUJAN URGE DOE TO MAXIMIZE LOCAL SUBCONTRACTING

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 932 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Letter to DOE Office of Environmental Management requests continued community engagement during transition of cleanup efforts

Today, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Representative Ben Ray Lujan sent a letter to the Department of Energy (DOE) Office of Environmental Management (EM) strongly encouraging them to maintain requirements from the existing National Nuclear Security Administration (NNSA) contract that support local community engagement as oversight of legacy environmental cleanup work at Los Alamos National Laboratory (LANL) transitions from NNSA to EM. In the letter to acting assistant secretary for environmental management, James "Mark" Whitney, the lawmakers highlighted the critical importance of LANL's subcontracting with local businesses to employment and economic development in Northern New Mexico, and asked that EM maintains each of NNSA's specific contracting requirements that helps maximize economic opportunities for local workers and businesses.

In late September, the Department of Energy announced that Energy Secretary Moniz had directed EM and NNSA to develop a plan to transition legacy environmental cleanup work from NNSA to EM to better align the focus and accountability of cleanup work. The current management and operating contract for LANL includes a number of specific subcontracting provisions and requirements that ensure support for local employment, companies, and communities.

"As [the Department of Energy] takes over management of legacy environmental cleanup work, we ask you to maintain each of NNSA's specific contracting requirements for local community engagement," the lawmakers continued. "Ensuring that we keep local businesses and experienced workers fully involved as the cleanup effort continues is critical to supporting the economy of Northern New Mexico."

The lawmakers outlined specific contracting provisions in the current contract that support the local community and regional economic development. Examples include a requirement that all businesses with subcontracts greater than $5 million are required to include a regional community development plan, the 5 percent pricing preference for subcontractors with a Northern New Mexico presence and the recommendation that contractors suggest how they will participate in community engagement activities in their bids. In addition to maintaining each of these provisions, the lawmakers asked EM to include community engagement as an evaluation criterion for any contract proposals for managing EM work at the Los Alamos site.

The full text of the letter is available below and HERE.

October 30, 2014

Mr. James M. "Mark" Whitney

Acting Assistant Secretary for Environmental Management

Department of Energy

1000 Independence Ave SW

Washington, District of Columbia 20585-0113

Dear Mr. Whitney:

In light of the Secretary Moniz's recent announcement that legacy environmental cleanup work at Los Alamos National Laboratory (LANL) will soon be overseen by DOE's Office of Environmental Management (EM), we write to strongly encourage EM to maintain all regional requirements from NNSA's existing prime contract that help maximize economic opportunities for local workers and businesses.

Northern New Mexico communities depend heavily on LANL for employment and regional economic development through the many subcontracts awarded to local companies. These local subcontractors provide critical support to the lab in a broad variety of areas, including environmental management. LANL's subcontracting with local businesses helps to sustain an important technical workforce pool in Northern New Mexico. Importantly, more than 40% of LANL's local major subcontractors are involved in EM's environmental restoration work. Given the deep interdependence of DOE and the region, we ask you to give careful thought in this transition to maintaining all existing contracts previously awarded by LANS to small businesses in the region that support the cleanup effort.

Under NNSA's current management and operating (MandO) contract for LANL there are a number of specific subcontracting provisions and requirements that ensure support for local employment, companies, and communities. For example, all businesses with subcontracts greater than $5 million are required to include a regional community development plan. The contract also requires that procurement provide a five percent pricing preference for subcontractors who have a Northern New Mexico presence. These provisions also apply to subcontracts placed through the Supply Chain Management Center. These unique provisions have incentivized many environmental restoration companies to invest in Northern New Mexico communities.

Finally, the original request for proposal for LANL's MandO contract required bidders to suggest in their bids how they will participate in community engagement activities. We ask that EM also include community engagement as an evaluation criterion for any prime contract proposals for managing EM work at the Los Alamos site.

As EM takes over management of legacy environmental cleanup work, we ask you to maintain each of NNSA's specific contracting requirements for local community engagement. Ensuring that we keep local businesses and experienced workers fully involved as the cleanup effort continues is critical to supporting the economy of Northern New Mexico.

Thank you for your consideration.

Sincerely,

Tom Udall

New Mexico Delegation Welcomes Disaster Declaration for September Floods

LENGTH: 588 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the Senator Martin Heinrich, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Today, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Representatives Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham announced that President Obama has issued a major disaster declaration for the state of New Mexico for the severe storms and flooding that occurred between Sept. 15 and Sept. 26.

The disaster declaration provides the counties of Colfax, Eddy, Lea, Lincoln, Otero, San Miguel, Santa Fe and Sierra with access to Federal Emergency Management Agency (FEMA) public assistance to repair damaged infrastructure, and provides statewide hazard mitigation assistance. The severe September storms and flooding significantly damaged roads, bridges, low-water crossings and other infrastructure in many New Mexico communities. The funding correlated with the disaster declaration will help with recovery efforts including debris removal, emergency protective measures, and repairs to roads, bridges and water utility facilities.

Last week, the lawmakers jointly urged the president to respond swiftly to the state of New Mexico's request for disaster assistance. According to the state's letter requesting the major disaster declaration, the total severe storm damage for the September floods has been assessed at $10.2 million, with damage to roads and bridges accounting for more than 70 percent of the total.

"The severe September storms and resulting flooding took a harsh toll on the roads, bridges and infrastructure of many of our communities, and the federal assistance from this disaster declaration will help expedite recovery efforts throughout the state," Udall said. "I am pleased with this quick response to our request and I will continue to work to ensure that the federal government supports affected New Mexico communities with the resources needed to rebuild."

"This disaster declaration is welcome news, and I'm pleased our communities in Colfax, Eddy, Lea, Lincoln, Otero, San Miguel, Santa Fe, and Sierra Counties will receive much-needed federal aid to recover from September's intense storms and severe floods," Heinrich said. "Last month's extreme weather conditions damaged roads, bridges, and other critical infrastructure New Mexicans rely on. Federal assistance to help restore our communities is a critical step toward the recovery effort."

"Our calls for action continue to be quickly answered, allowing us to bring much-needed assistance to the New Mexicans affected by the September storms," Pearce said. "I remain committed to working with the rest of the delegation and federal agencies to provide needed relief to our communities in continued need of assistance. We can and will rebuild for a stronger tomorrow. It is an obligation that must be fulfilled."

"The federal assistance available as a result of this disaster declaration will help the recovery effort in communities throughout New Mexico that were impacted by the September storms," Luján said. "The Obama administration's prompt response to our call for assistance will ensure that these much-needed resources will contribute to the rebuilding process."

"I appreciate FEMA's decision to make assistance available to the broad swath of New Mexico communities affected by flooding," Lujan Grisham said. "However, I urge the agency to reconsider the request for assistance to the metro area in Bernalillo County."

National mood flavors NM congressional races

BYLINE: SUSAN MONTOYA BRYAN, Associated Press

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL; POLITICAL NEWS

LENGTH: 533 words

DATELINE: ALBUQUERQUE, N.M.

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) - The battle for New Mexico's U.S. Senate seat is intensifying as Election Day approaches, and incumbent Democrat Tom Udall and Republican challenger Allen Weh are scrambling to secure the votes of those who remain undecided.

The distance between Udall and Weh is shrinking as the retired Marine colonel's campaign works to capitalizes on general frustration with the Obama administration and the lack of progress in Washington on a host of issues.

An Albuquerque Journal poll released Monday (http://bit.ly/1nKrsAQ) showed 50 percent of likely voters backing Udall to 43 percent for Weh, with 8 percent undecided. Just a month earlier, Udall had a 13-point advantage.

Pollster Brian Sanderoff said Weh was able to slightly improve his support among Democrat voters while adding to his Republican base. Udall has been able to maintain his lead thanks to stronger support from independent voters.

"The race narrowed as people began hearing Allen Weh's conservative message, but getting to the point that the race could turn around, that would be a real uphill battle for Allen Weh," Sanderoff said.

Weh will have a chance to spread his message Thursday evening when he squares off against Udall in their first televised debate. Weh has been critical of the incumbent for not agreeing to debate earlier in the election cycle.

Weh's campaign ads have linked Udall to the Obama administration's often criticized efforts to overhaul health care. The latest television ad states that a vote to send the first-term senator back to Washington is a vote for President Barack Obama.

After accusing Weh of favoring cuts to social programs, Udall's campaign has shifted focus in the remaining week. In an effort to appeal to female voters, his latest ad touts his work on laws aimed at curbing domestic violence.

Udall, a former attorney general and congressman, has a sizeable campaign fund and has used the tightening of the race to make a plea for more money this week. Weh, an Albuquerque business owner, has put up some of his personal fortune to run an aggressive challenge.

New Mexico's three congressional seats are also up for grabs.

In southern New Mexico, 3rd District Rep. Steve Pearce has been fending off attacks from the national Democratic Congressional Committee and Democrat Roxanne Lara, a Carlsbad lawyer who is trying to unseat him.

Pearce held the seat from 2003 to 2009, and most recently since 2011. The district covers a wide swath of southern New Mexico, from a sliver of the U.S.-Mexico border to the state's most productive oilfields.

Pearce, a vocal critic of the Obama administration and what he has described as the overreach of the federal government when it comes to Western water and land rights, had a significant campaign cash advantage over Lara heading into the final weeks.

In the 1st Congressional District that covers most of Albuquerque, Democrat Michelle Lujan Grisham is being challenged in her bid for a second term by Republican Mike Frese, a 66-year-old scientist and small business owner from Corrales. For the 3rd Congressional District seat, Democrat three-term incumbent Rep. Ben Ray Lujan is being challenged by Republican Jefferson Byrd of Tucumcari.

FARMINGTON In the U.S. representative District 3 race, an incumbent is running for re-election, his opponent is trying to win the seat again and a write-in candidate thinks poorly of them both.

Ben Ray Luján, 42, was elected to the seat in 2009, and the Democrat is proud of the work he's done in his first term, he said. This includes shining more attention on Los Alamos and Sandia national laboratories and working with colleagues to commercialize those labs' projects, he said.

Jefferson Byrd, a 43-year-old Republican, ran against Luján in 2012, and he knows he can win this race because nothing has changed since Luján took office, he said. The state is losing jobs, the federal government is snatching private property and more animals are being listed as endangered species, he said.

Thomas Hook, 49, also a Republican, is a write-in candidate. He's running for the seat because Luján and "the Democrats" have failed New Mexico, he said. They "rammed" the Affordable Care Act down the throats of New Mexicans and "punted" the immigration issue, ignoring many illegal immigrants' rights as citizens, he said. He added that he's disappointed in Byrd, too.

The economy is the top concern for Luján. New Mexico ranked 15th in the nation for job creation a few years ago, but now it's now 49th, he said. Texas, Arizona and Colorado are attracting more jobs than New Mexico, he said.

Access to education for their children from preschool to college has New Mexico parents worried, he said, and poverty is a big issue for many families.

When asked how he'd fix some of those issues, Luján referenced a mantra of his father's: "Before you can tackle a problem, you first have to admit there is one," he said.

"When New Mexico's ranking came out over the last three years, we didn't hear a lot of this talked about," he said.

Byrd said access to water is another serious problem for the state, but it probably ranks behind the issue of federal agencies such as the Bureau of Land Management and the Environmental Protection Agency hindering state and local governments, and corporate operations.

Veterans are also being dropped through the cracks in the system, he said. Some weren't getting timely care from the Veterans Administration, and others' documents were illegally shredded, he said.

He said he'd solve those problems by bringing attention to them and filing the "right paperwork. That's actually the easy part. How we're going to push back on the bureaucracies," he said, will be the hard part.

Hook said securing the U.S.-Mexico border is important. But illegal immigrants should be made legal residents so they can vote, he said. If elected, he said, he'd try to pump water from the Gulf of Mexico into New Mexico, build desalination plants to purify the water and legalize marijuana, growing it copiously to create jobs.

New Mexico Delegation Welcomes Expansion of President's Disaster Declaration for Summer Floods

LENGTH: 586 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the Senator Martin Heinrich, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Representatives Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Luján, and Michelle Lujan Grisham announced that President Obama has expanded a major disaster for the state of New Mexico for the severe storms and flooding from July 27 - August 5 to include Sandoval, Otero and Lincoln counties, as well as the Pueblo of Santa Clara.

On October 6, the president declared a major disaster, which meant that federal aid is available to help state, tribal, and local recovery efforts. The original declaration made assistance available on a cost-sharing basis for damage to public infrastructure in Guadalupe, Rio Arriba, and San Miguel counties and the Pueblo of Acoma. Friday's amendment expands this eligibility to Sandoval, Otero, and Lincoln counties, as well as the Pueblo of Santa Clara. Federal funding will also be made available on a cost-sharing basis to assist with hazard mitigation statewide. Additional designations may be made at a later date if requested by the state and warranted by the results of further damage assessments.

New Mexico's lawmakers on Oct. 2 jointly urged the president to respond quickly to the request for disaster assistance for the state of New Mexico. The severe summer storms and flooding damaged roads, bridges, a dam structure, and other infrastructure. According to Governor Susana Martinez's letter requesting the major disaster declaration, damages resulting from these storms have currently been assessed at $3.93 million.

"This expanded federal assistance is welcome news for residents of Sandoval, Lincoln and Otero counties, as well as Santa Clara Pueblo, who all sustained severe damage to roads, bridges, dams and other structures," Udall said. "I will be closely monitoring the recovery efforts and will keep pushing to ensure the federal government fulfills its obligations to help with restoration in New Mexico's communities."

"The President's addition of Lincoln, Otero, and Sandoval Counties, and the Santa Clara Pueblo, to this month's disaster declaration is welcome news," Heinrich said. "Federal disaster assistance will provide much-needed help for New Mexico communities to rebuild after intense storms and severe floods damaged roads and critical infrastructure over the summer. This is a great step in the recovery effort."

"Our calls for action are being quickly answered, allowing us to bring much-needed assistance to the New Mexicans affected by the September storms," Pearce said. "I remain committed to working with the rest of the Delegation and federal agencies to provide needed relief to our communities in continued need of assistance. We can and will rebuild for a stronger tomorrow. It is an obligation that must be fulfilled."

"Expanding the disaster declaration to include these additional communities is vital to their efforts to rebuild in the wake of the storm and the damage it caused," Luján said. "This federal assistance will help address the need to repair critical infrastructure in impacted areas across New Mexico."

"Many smaller, rural communities are especially vulnerable to natural disasters and they depend on this federal assistance," Lujan Grisham said. "I appreciate the expanded declaration from the President and I'm prepared to continue to work with these communities as they recover."

New Mexico: New Mexico Delegation Requests Prompt Action on Major Disaster Declaration for September Floods

LENGTH: 354 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

TOm Udall Senator for New Mexico has issued the following news release:

WASHINGTON - Today, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Representatives Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Luján, and Michelle Lujan Grisham sent a letter to President Obama, requesting prompt action on the state of New Mexico's recent request for a major disaster declaration to assist with recovery efforts following severe storms and flooding caused by Hurricane Odile in late September.

Between Sept. 15 and Sept. 25, parts of New Mexico including Colfax, Eddy, Lea, Otero, San Miguel, Santa Fe and Sierra counties endured severe storms and flooding that significantly damaged roads, bridges, low-water crossings and other infrastructure. Yesterday, Oct. 22, the state requested the federal government declare a major disaster, provide the correlated public assistance for counties that suffered extensive damage, and provide statewide hazard mitigation assistance. The associated funding would help with recovery efforts including debris removal, emergency protective measures, and repairs to roads, bridges and water control facilities.

"In light of the ongoing losses and possible long-term impacts from flooding during the time period of September 15 through September 25, 2014, we request your expedited attention to Governor Martinez's request on behalf of the State for a major disaster designation and the correlated public assistance," the lawmakers wrote. "We remain committed to providing the necessary assistance to you and the governor in expediting New Mexico's recovery efforts and ensuring an effective response from this extreme weather event."

According to Governor Martinez's letter requesting the major disaster declaration, the total severe storm damage has been assessed at $10.2 million, with damage to roads and bridges accounting for more than 70 percent of the total. Other damage includes extensive debris, disruption of oil and gas development, agricultural loss, and water and wastewater infrastructure.

New Mexico: Udall, Heinrich, Luján Announce $8.5 Million for Sipapu Ski Resort, Santa Fe Charter School

LENGTH: 581 words

DATELINE: Santa Fe

TOm Udall Senator for New Mexico has issued the following news release:

WASHINGTON - Today, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Representative Ben Ray Luján announced that Sipapu Recreational Development in Vadito and the Academy for Technology and the Classics Foundation in Santa Fe will each receive more than $4.2 million in guaranteed loans to advance their operations. Sipapu Recreational Development will receive $4.235 million to improve its ski resort operations, including funding to purchase equipment and machinery, provide working capital and to pay off existing debt. The Academy for Technology and the Classics Foundation will receive $4.3 million to pay off bond debt on the Academy for Technology and the Classics Charter School's property and facility.

"These funds are important to help rural businesses in New Mexico thrive and generate economic development in our communities," Udall said. "The Sipapu ski resort creates jobs and attracts tourists to northern New Mexico, and these funds will help to ensure the resort continues to draw visitors and revenue to the area. The Academy for Technology and the Classics Charter School is helping to prepare Santa Fe students with the skills to succeed in college, and provide them with the technological skills needed in today's work force. As a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, I will continue to push for funding to help New Mexico businesses to grow, and to expand educational opportunities for our state's next generation of leaders."

"These Rural Development funds will help Sipapu ski resort and the Academy for Technology and the Classics improve their operations," said Heinrich. "Places like Sipapu in northern New Mexico attract visitors from across the country and contribute to our state's $6.1 billion outdoor recreation economy. I'm also pleased with the investment to support STEM education, so that students will continue to receive technology skills that will prepare them to compete in today's economy."

"Rural Development funds provide important resources to our communities and contribute to economic development that is needed in rural New Mexico," Luján said. "These projects will help contribute to efforts to build a stronger economy in northern New Mexico by promoting a local business in Taos County and the tourism industry that is an important part of the economy. They will also help enhance the Academy for Technology and the Classics Charter School's ability to serve its students and ensure they receive a good education."

The Sipapu Ski and Summer Resort was founded in 1952 in the Sangre de Cristo Mountain region, and has more than 40 ski trails. The family-friendly resort offers terrain catering to skiers and snowboarders of all ability levels, and claims itself home to the longest ski season in the state.

Established in 2000, the Academy for Technology and the Classics enrolls approximately 365 students in grades 7-12, and seeks to provide a classical and technology-based approach to education in a public school setting.

The loans were made available through the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA)'s Business and Industry Guaranteed Loan Program. The program provides loans to improve the economic and environmental climate in rural communities by bolstering existing private credit structures and guaranteeing the quality of loans.

New Mexico Delegation Welcomes Expansion of President's Disaster Declaration for Summer Floods; Lawmakers had urged 'prompt action' to help state recover from widespread storm damage; Sen. Martin Heinrich (D-NM) News Release

Las Vegas Optic (New Mexico)

October 26, 2014 Sunday

Martinez for governor

BYLINE: Optic Editorial Board

SECTION: EDITORIALS

LENGTH: 654 words

Roughly 70 percent of registered voters in San Miguel County are Democrats. Add to that statistic the fact that San Miguel County doesn't even come close to having the population of counties like Bernalillo, Sandoval, Doña Ana or Santa Fe, and you might expect that a Republican governor wouldn't give a second thought to the issues we're dealing with.

Fortunately for Las Vegas and San Miguel County, Gov. Susana Martinez and her administration have paid attention to our issues. What's more, Gov. Martinez has become one of our biggest advocates in Santa Fe when it comes to our city's pressing water infrastructure needs. Her strong support is one of the reasons that Las Vegas' top water project, the enlargement of Bradner Reservoir, is now fully funded.

The significance of this project for our community is huge. It will triple our current water storage capacity, allowing us to store a year's worth of water. That extra storage will be vital for our community in times of extended drought or in the event that a catastrophic fire breaks out in the Gallinas Watershed, where Las Vegas gets about 90 percent of its drinking water. And it will help our community with its economic development efforts.

Gov. Martinez understands those realities because she has taken the time to come to Las Vegas and tour our reservoirs and to speak to the city workers on the front lines who are dealing with these issues.

We believe Gov. Martinez has done more to help Las Vegas get a handle on its water problem than any governor before her, and for that reason, we urge voters to re-elect her to a second term.

Las Vegas isn't the only community that has benefited when it comes to water projects. This past legislative session the governor asked the Legislature to set aside more than $100 million for critically important water projects across the state. While she didn't get all of the funding she requested, she did get a significant chunk.

We also like the fact that Martinez has pushed state lawmakers to spend the state's capital outlay dollars wisely. She has repeatedly asked lawmakers to fully fund projects so that they can be completed as soon as possible.

Finally, we agree with her stance that more needs to be done to ensure that New Mexico students are getting the best education possible.

Regular readers of this editorial page know that we haven't always agreed with the governor. Her appointment of Carl Foster to the Highlands University Board of Regents earlier this year was misguided, given that he had a pending lawsuit against the university. Her administration's handling of the behavioral health audit was troubling. And the teacher evaluation system implemented by her Public Education Department is flawed and needs to be fixed.

But the reality is that her opponent, Gary King, has also made some serious missteps as attorney general -- most notably his office's bungling of cases involving former secretary of state Rebecca Vigil-Giron and the Smiley Gallegos housing authority matter -- and we're not convinced he would do a better job as governor.

Sen. Tom Udall and Congressman Ben Ray Luján are also up for re-election. Like Martinez, both Udall and Luján, along with Sen. Martin Heinrich, have helped the city with the funding for the Bradner Reservoir project.

They did so by lobbying the EPA to grant a waiver so that the city could tap into $20 million in funding for the project from the United States Environmental Protection Agency Drinking Water State Revolving Loan Fund program. Under EPA rules, dams typically aren't funded with that money.

As a result of our congressional delegation's efforts, the city ended up with a $3 million grant and is in the process of closing on a $17 million low-interest loan.

This is just one example of how Udall and Luján, both Democrats, have been responsive to the needs of our community.

We urge voters to re-elect Sen. Udall and Congressman Luján.

3rd Congressional Dist. candidates debate

BYLINE: JAMES MONTELEONE JOURNAL STAFF WRITER

SECTION: METRO & NEW MEXICO; Pg. C2

LENGTH: 362 words

A televised 3rd Congressional District debate Thursday on New Mexico PBS stations highlighted differing views from Democratic Rep. Ben Ray Luján and Republican challenger Jeff Byrd, with issues ranging from the role of the federal government to climate change.

Luján is seeking his fourth term in the U.S. House, representing the northern New Mexico congressional district. Byrd, a Harding County rancher, is challenging Luján for the seat a second time.

In the hourlong debate, Byrd said the federal government is overstepping its bounds and needs to be reined in. He said over-regulation by federal agencies such as the Environmental Protection Agency, the Bureau of Land Management and the Army Corps of Engineers has caused significant job losses.

"We have to change the direction here in northern New Mexico, we have to put pressure on the agencies that are killing jobs, and we have to allow the state to make the decisions that are best for the people that live here," Byrd said.

Luján emphasized the value of federal programs in lending a hand in New Mexico, such as providing subsidies to farmers and ranchers in addition to ongoing federal support for the state's national labs and military bases.

To better fund such programs, Luján said he would back pay-as-you-go federal spending plans requiring Congress to fully fund programs when implemented.

"What I'm suggesting is you go find targeted cuts or revenues to be able to pay for those programs," Luján said.

The candidates were also split on climate change issues.

Luján called for prompt federal action to address warming global temperatures that he said are caused by human activity. Asked where the federal government would get the money to address climate change issues, Luján said, "It's a matter of priorities."

Byrd said data on climate change is inconclusive. He said the government should take more time to ensure data is accurate before any action is taken. He said Congress' efforts would be better focused on addressing economic issues.

"The reality is it (the climate change debate) doesn't improve New Mexico," Byrd said. "This discussion is not going to move jobs forward. We need to be talking about jobs."

Cheryl Jaeger, Shane Doucet, And Andrew Jones Nichole Francis ReynoldsEdgar RodriguezLinda Jordan Willard

LENGTH: 1071 words

After five lobbyists left Williams and Jensen in April to start their own K Street enterprise, the law and lobbying firm was on the hunt for new colleagues, and this fall it scooped up a bipartisan trio including Cheryl Jaeger, a top health care aide to former House Majority Leader Eric Cantor, a Virginia Republican.

The two new Democrats at the firm are Shane Doucet, most recently a lobbyist with Locke Lord Strategies and a onetime aide to Rep. Chris John of Louisiana, who left the House after an unsuccessful Senate race in 2004, and Andrew Jones, who left his gig as legislative director and counsel to Chief Deputy Democratic Whip Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico to join the firm.

"Cheryl's leadership on health care strategy, Shane's experience working with the administration and the Hill on issues ranging from energy to health care to pensions and Andy's knowledge of how to forge bipartisan consensus on issues is a huge asset to clients," says Susan Hirschmann, a Williams and Jensen partner. "We had a lot of conversations and talked to a lot of people, and quite honestly we're just so proud they decided to join our firm."

Jaeger, 39, found herself unexpectedly in the job market when Cantor lost his primary in June and then resigned his congressional seat in the summer.

"I'd been on the Hill for 15 years, in House leadership for the past nine years, so I really had to make a decision: stay on the Hill or did I want to challenge myself," Jaeger says. "I decided to get out of my comfort zone and see what impact I could make on these policy issues just from a different angle."

Doucet says he got to know numerous people at Williams and Jensen by sharing clients and working on common legislative battles. He's bringing with him a roster of clients that includes the Louisiana Sheriffs' Association and El Paso Electric.

"A real passion for me is health care, health and wellness, which is something I worked on intimately on the Affordable Care Act," says Doucet, 41.

Jones, whose boss on the Hill, Lujan, is vice chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, says "there was a feeling" that Lujan's office was well established, "so I thought it was time to look for new challenges."

"I'm still working on the same issues that you see up on the Hill but from a different perspective," Jones, 34, adds.

Nichole Francis Reynolds

MasterCard has hired former congressional aide Nichole Francis Reynolds as director of federal affairs, pursuing the credit card company's interests in such issues as data security, taxes, trade, emerging payment technology and consumer protection. Previously, Francis Reynolds was chief of staff for Alabama Democrat Rep. Terri A. Sewell.

"MasterCard," Francis Reynolds says, "connects consumers, financial institutions and merchants and will allow me to use my legislative and legal experiences to focus on cutting edge financial services, homeland security and consumer protection issues."

In the time Francis Reynolds worked for Sewell, the lawmaker became the chief deputy Democratic whip and an active member of the Financial Services Committee, getting funding for sewer, water and tornado recovery projects in her district. She also sponsored a bill awarding Congressional Gold Medals for the four little girls killed in the 1963 church bombing in Birmingham, Ala.

From 2008 to 2010, Francis Reynolds was chief of staff for Ohio Rep. Betty Sutton, who lost her re-election race in 2012.

She has been an associate at two law firms: Baker, Donelson, Bearman, Caldwell & Berkowitz and Baker Hostetler. At both firms, Francis Reynolds says she worked with lobbyists and learned the importance of advocacy "whether on behalf of a corporation, nonprofit, university or local government."

She spent nearly two years as district director Rep. Harold Ford Jr., a Tennessee Democrat who left the House in 2006 to run unsuccessfully for the Senate. She later worked on John Kerry's 2004 presidential campaign and was counsel to the House Homeland Security subcommittee on emergency communications, preparedness and response.

MasterCard is implementing chip technology for payments next year, which will help minimize security breaches. Francis Reynolds says she will be educating policy makers about this changeover and how it will affect consumers. "It will also protect our government and our nation," she says.

Edgar Rodriguez

Former Navy corpsman Edgar Rodriguez is using his military experience to lobby on behalf of the Association of the United States Navy as director of legislation and government relations.

After five years in the service, Rodriguez, 32, decided to pursue a career on Capitol Hill starting as an intern for the House Foreign Affairs Committee and Rep. Adam Smith, D-Wash., before being hired as a legislative correspondent for Sen. Benjamin L. Cardin, D-Md., in 2012. He was later promoted to legislative aide on defense, veterans' affairs, health care and intelligence.

"I met a lot of great staffers on the Hill but very few of them are veterans and even a smaller amount are enlisted veterans," he says, "so with that, I do feel that my perspective does bring something valuable."

At the association, Rodriguez, is replacing Anthony Wallis, who left for a risk analyst position at ABS Consulting.

-- Kaitlyn Ridel

Linda Jordan Willard

Although the route from Capitol Hill and K Street is well-trodden, not many lobbyists have a stint in France on their resumes in between. Former congressional aide Linda Jordan Willard joined the TCH Group this month after living in Lyon for years while her husband ran a biotech company there.

"I love to cook and I love markets, so I had a ball," says the new senior policy adviser and counsel, adding that she's now fluent in French.

Though she did some consulting and translating work with Interpol while abroad, the new gig with TCH will allow her to draw on her work on Capitol Hill.

She got her start in the office of fellow Texan and then-Sen. Kay Bailey Hutchison, a Republican. Jordan Willard, 45, also handled energy and environmental matters as a counsel on the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee.

Despite the difficult partisan environment, she says she has colleagues from both sides of the aisle. "I think there's always room to get stuff done," she says. "I'm idealistic that way."

Udall, Heinrich, Luján Announce $8.5 Million for Sipapu Ski Resort, Santa Fe Charter School

LENGTH: 583 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the Senator Martin Heinrich, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Today, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Representative Ben Ray Luján announced that Sipapu Recreational Development in Vadito and the Academy for Technology and the Classics Foundation in Santa Fe will each receive more than $4.2 million in guaranteed loans to advance their operations. Sipapu Recreational Development will receive $4.235 million to improve its ski resort operations, including funding to purchase equipment and machinery, provide working capital and to pay off existing debt. The Academy for Technology and the Classics Foundation will receive $4.3 million to pay off bond debt on the Academy for Technology and the Classics Charter School's property and facility.

"These funds are important to help rural businesses in New Mexico thrive and generate economic development in our communities," Udall said. "The Sipapu ski resort creates jobs and attracts tourists to northern New Mexico, and these funds will help to ensure the resort continues to draw visitors and revenue to the area. The Academy for Technology and the Classics Charter School is helping to prepare Santa Fe students with the skills to succeed in college, and provide them with the technological skills needed in today's work force. As a member of the Senate Appropriations Committee, I will continue to push for funding to help New Mexico businesses to grow, and to expand educational opportunities for our state's next generation of leaders."

"These Rural Development funds will help Sipapu ski resort and the Academy for Technology and the Classics improve their operations," said Heinrich. "Places like Sipapu in northern New Mexico attract visitors from across the country and contribute to our state's $6.1 billion outdoor recreation economy. I'm also pleased with the investment to support STEM education, so that students will continue to receive technology skills that will prepare them to compete in today's economy."

"Rural Development funds provide important resources to our communities and contribute to economic development that is needed in rural New Mexico," Luján said. "These projects will help contribute to efforts to build a stronger economy in northern New Mexico by promoting a local business in Taos County and the tourism industry that is an important part of the economy. They will also help enhance the Academy for Technology and the Classics Charter School's ability to serve its students and ensure they receive a good education."

The Sipapu Ski and Summer Resort was founded in 1952 in the Sangre de Cristo Mountain region, and has more than 40 ski trails. The family-friendly resort offers terrain catering to skiers and snowboarders of all ability levels, and claims itself home to the longest ski season in the state.

Established in 2000, the Academy for Technology and the Classics enrolls approximately 365 students in grades 7-12, and seeks to provide a classical and technology-based approach to education in a public school setting.

The loans were made available through the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA)'s Business and Industry Guaranteed Loan Program. The program provides loans to improve the economic and environmental climate in rural communities by bolstering existing private credit structures and guaranteeing the quality of loans.

New Mexico Delegation Requests Prompt Action on Major Disaster Declaration for September Floods; 'Expedited attention' sought to speed recovery efforts following extreme weather; Sen. Martin Heinrich (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. SENATE DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 684 words

WASHINGTON, D.C. - Today, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Representatives Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Lujan, and Michelle Lujan Grisham sent a letter to President Obama, requesting prompt action on the state of New Mexico's recent request for a major disaster declaration to assist with recovery efforts following severe storms and flooding caused by Hurricane Odile in late September.

Between Sept. 15 and Sept. 25, parts of New Mexico including Colfax, Eddy, Lea, Otero, San Miguel, Santa Fe and Sierra counties endured severe storms and flooding that significantly damaged roads, bridges, low-water crossings and other infrastructure. Yesterday, Oct. 22, the state requested the federal government declare a major disaster, provide the correlated public assistance for counties that suffered extensive damage, and provide statewide hazard mitigation assistance. The associated funding would help with recovery efforts including debris removal, emergency protective measures, and repairs to roads, bridges and water control facilities.

"In light of the ongoing losses and possible long-term impacts from flooding during the time period of September 15 through September 25, 2014, we request your expedited attention to Governor Martinez's request on behalf of the State for a major disaster designation and the correlated public assistance," the lawmakers wrote. "We remain committed to providing the necessary assistance to you and the governor in expediting New Mexico's recovery efforts and ensuring an effective response from this extreme weather event."

According to Governor Martinez's letter requesting the major disaster declaration, the total severe storm damage has been assessed at $10.2 million, with damage to roads and bridges accounting for more than 70 percent of the total. Other damage includes extensive debris, disruption of oil and gas development, agricultural loss, and water and wastewater infrastructure.

Dist. 3 voters should return Ben Ray Luján to Congress

SECTION: EDITORIALS; Pg. A6

LENGTH: 346 words

Incumbent U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján is seeking his fourth term in Congress and has put job creation and making New Mexico more economically competitive at the top of his to-do list if re-elected on Nov. 4.

Luján, a Democrat who was elected to the 3rd Congressional District seat in 2008, has grown in this position and represents the people of his northern New Mexico district and its cultural values well.

Prior to going to Washington, Luján, the son of the late New Mexico Speaker of the House Ben Luján, served on the state Public Regulation Commission, was a deputy state treasurer and a state Department of Cultural Affairs administrator. He has a bachelor's degree in business administration from New Mexico Highlands University.

Luján says it's important to develop relationships with members of both parties and to be open to different ideas. His efforts range from working to create business opportunities through public-private agreements with Los Alamos National Laboratory to more local issues such as securing money for acequias and promoting local agriculture.

He is a co-founder of the Technology Transfer Caucus and as a member of Communications and Technology Subcommittee is working to expand broadband access in rural communities. He also is a member of the Oversight and Investigations Subcommittee which provides oversight of the Department of Energy and the national laboratories. He has proposed that the National Nuclear Security Administration be restructured to better balance nuclear weapons work and nuclear defense-related research and development.

Luján is vice chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus and supports comprehensive immigration reform and a path to citizenship. He supports renewable energy and introduced legislation to protect the Sabinoso Wilderness and for the Rio Grande del Norte National Monument, which the president designated last year.

Luján wants to continue to be a voice for New Mexico families in Congress. The Journal recommends 3rd Congressional District voters return Ben Ray Luján to Washington, D.C., to do just that.

ANA-PAC Endorses Ben Ray Lujan in New Mexico House Race

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 396 words

DATELINE: SILVER SPRING, Md.

The American Nurses Association issued the following news release:

The American Nurses Association (ANA)'s Political Action Committee (ANA-PAC) (http://www.nursingworld.org/MainMenuCategories/Policy-Advocacy/ANAPAC) today endorsed Rep. Ben Ray Lujan (D-NM-3) in his bid to continue serving constituents in New Mexico's third district. Each election cycle, ANA-PAC endorses candidates who have demonstrated strong support for nursing and health care issues and will best serve the interests of nurses and their patients.

Born and raised in New Mexico, Rep. Lujan has been a champion for nurses and supported legislation in Congress on home health, safe staffing and Nursing Workforce Development Programs. Additionally, Rep. Lujan worked to improve health care as a member of the New Mexico Public Regulation Commission by investigating practices of the health insurance industry. The investigation led to the development of legislation that expanded access to insurance and closed loopholes the industry had been using to unfairly deny medical claims and void policies.

"Congressman Lujan has been very supportive of the role nurses play in the health care delivery system in New Mexico," said Deborah J. Walker, MSN, RN, executive director of the New Mexico Nurses Association (http://www.nmna.org/). "We applaud his support of health care reform and feel he is the type of leader who will help ensure nurses' voices are heard on Capitol Hill."

ANA-PAC (http://www.nursingworld.org/MainMenuCategories/Policy-Advocacy/ANAPAC) makes endorsement decisions based on candidate interviews, communication with ANA's constituent and state nurses associations, campaign information, and the candidate's voting record on ANA's priority issues.

ANA encourages nurses to volunteer for political campaigns of their choice, Democrat, Republican, Independent or another political party. Volunteering on a campaign provides opportunities to advance some of nursing's core issues, including safe nurse staffing, safe patient handling and mobility, ensuring that advanced practice registered nurses (APRNs) can practice to the full extent of their license and education, and securing access to safe, quality health care for all.

This recognition is a testament to the business savvy and entrepreneurial spirit of the hard-working small businessmen and women in Los Alamos, as well as the local organizations that provide support and guidance for the business community," Luján said. "I commend Los Alamos businesses for their efforts to harness the power of the Internet - from social media to websites, blogs, and more - and using its potential to build stronger businesses, a stronger economy, and a stronger community. This award also serves as a reminder of the importance that the Internet plays in our economy and the need to promote broadband expansion in communities around New Mexico."

Google and Ipsos, an independent research firm, analyzed a variety of factors to determine which cities would receive a Google eCity Award. Winning cities had businesses that exhibited a strong online presence in multiple areas including social media, website, blogs, and mobile accessibility.

Forum fuels quarrel in congressional race

BYLINE: DEBORAH BAKER JOURNAL CAPITOL BUREAU

SECTION: METRO & NEW MEXICO; Pg. C1

LENGTH: 444 words

SANTA FE - Democratic U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján scolded his Republican challenger, Jefferson Byrd, on Wednesday for walking out on a League of Women Voters forum in Santa Fe the previous evening.

Luján brought it up during a televised debate between the two candidates in New Mexico's 3rd Congressional District that dealt largely with their view of the role of the federal government.

Byrd left the league's candidate forum after reading an opening statement complaining that questions from the audience would be screened. He said he wanted an "unfiltered exchange."

He said the league had refused his requests to have questions asked directly, to provide him the political affiliations of the screeners, or to allow campaign staff to be part of the screening process.

"Last night, Jeff Byrd, when you had a chance to be able to face the voters, you ran out on them. You left that important forum," Luján told his opponent.

The congressman contrasted it with what he said was his own accessibility to constituents in hundreds of town halls and other events throughout the district, which covers roughly the northern half of the state.

Byrd, who ranches near Tucumcari, is making his second run at unseating Luján in the heavily Democratic district that first elected Luján in 2008.

During Wednesday's debate hosted by KOB-TV, the Republican nominee said his platform is based on "faith, family, finances and fuel." The latter references were to the federal deficit and pushing the development of "all sources of fuel."

Byrd blamed too much regulation, along with overreach by federal agencies, for the decline in mining and other businesses and for job losses in the district.

The GOP nominee said he wants to do away with federal agencies such as the Environmental Protection Agency and the Department of Education and return more power to the states.

"I believe in a more pragmatic approach," of objecting when federal agencies overreach, Luján said.

And he said Byrd's support for the privatization of Social Security and Medicare would hurt New Mexicans.

"We cannot keep kicking the can down the road and expect future generations to worry about it," Byrd said of Social Security funding.

The candidates agreed on the significance of Los Alamos National Laboratory and the need to protect its funding.

But Luján said Byrd's proposal for a "penny plan" - cutting 1 cent of every dollar of federal spending - would mean mandatory, across-the-board cuts that could hurt LANL.

Asked about legalizing recreational marijuana use, as neighboring Colorado has done, Byrd said he is opposed, while Luján said New Mexicans should "watch closely" the developments in Colorado and Washington.

House candidates square off in variety of issues

BYLINE: Arin McKenna

SECTION: TODAY'S NEWS

LENGTH: 1207 words

The differences were stark between Democrat Ben R. (Ray) Luján, who is running for reelection for the U.S. House of Representatives District 3, and his Republican opponent Jefferson L. Byrd at the League of Women Voters of Los Alamos candidate forum last week.

These are key points from the candidate's responses to questions. See "Fact-checking the candidates" for some research into the candidates' competing claims.

What action should Congress take regarding social security?

Luján opposes the privatization of social security, as well as raising the age for retirement or reducing benefits.

"The way we strengthen social security is we strengthen the economy. We bring more people in, we get more people working and contributing to the program," Luján said. "It's solvent. We just celebrated 75 years, and with all of us working together we'll celebrate 75 more."

Byrd countered, "According to the CBO (Congressional Budget Office), social security is going to fail...We all have to take actions now before that occurs."

Did either candidate support a higher minimum wage?

Byrd does not. He advocated instead for "protecting employers" and creating mining and drilling jobs.

"What I do support is increasing the number of high paying jobs...Minimum wage jobs are what get people into the workforce, and we need to make sure that there is a distinction there." Byrd said.

According to Byrd, only four percent of the population is on minimum wage and only 100,000 of those rely on that to survive.

Luján supports an increase, citing a letter signed by 600 economists and seven Nobel Prize winners which supports minimum wage legislation in Congress. "Increasing the minimum wage is important, and telling 147,000 people in New Mexico, 19 percent of New Mexico's workforce, that they don't deserve a raise...,"Luján said. "We can support New Mexico moving toward creating more opportunities with high wage jobs as well."

What role and to what extent do the candidates think the EPA has harmed everything surrounding high paying jobs?

Byrd stated that his goal was to eliminate the EPA and let state agencies regulate environmental issues.

"It's clear that the EPA is having an impact on businesses here in Northern New Mexico, and it's through regulation and it needs to be reigned in," Byrd said.

Luján talked about the impacts of acid rain on agricultural lands, especially in New Mexico, before regulation by the EPA.

"Eliminating the EPA would do away with all those efforts and protections," Luján said.

Luján also noted that he had pushed back against unreasonable EPA regulations, such as placing water tanks and acequias in the same category as the Mississippi River.

Because government-spending cuts have already impacted the laboratory, what would the candidates do to advocate for the lab?

Both candidates said they supported lab funding.

Luján stated that he voted against the Budget Control Act and sequestration, which had significant impacts on LANL. He also noted that he worked to secure additional cleanup funds and supported an Defense Authorization Act amendment that expands the lab's mission and reduces NNSA interference.

Byrd supports the lab's role in national defense and making sure the armed forces "are the best, most well equipped fighting army ever."

How would the candidates cut or reduce debt?

Byrd claimed that the federal debt had doubled in the last six years. He advocated for cutting one penny per dollar from the budget to pay down the debt. He also wants to eliminate baseline budgeting, which is used to project future funding requirements.

Luján called Byrd's one-cent plan "another sequestration plan" that would reduce funding for LANL.

Luján advocated a return to the PAYGO system used to balance the budgets under the Clinton administration. He noted that Congress adopted a pay-as-you-go initiative in 2010, but claimed that the House had eliminated that in 2011.

People in Congress will not compromise. How do the candidates think they are going to change that?

Luján pointed to his participation in efforts such as the Tech Transfer Caucus, the National Laboratories Caucus, the Congressional Rural Caucus and the Energy Caucus.

"We may not be able to agree on 80 percent, but we can find 20 percent that we can work on, and that's how we can get things done," Luján said.

Byrd stated, "The reality is, we have to make a distinction between compromise and capitulation. There are some things that are not worth capitulating, and the loss of jobs here in New Mexico is something we don't want to see."

Do the candidates support legislation to insure that women will have equal pay for equal work?

Byrd stated that "I absolutely support equal pay for equal work."

Luján cited his support for the Lilly Ledbetter Fair Pay Act and the Fair Pay Act of 2013, which is stalled in Congress.

"In 2014 this shouldn't be debated, it shouldn't be stalled, it should be done. And there's no reason why Congress should be delaying this any more," Luján said.

Affordable Care Act: There is a claim that citizens can not keep their doctor or health plan. What would the candidates do to correct thus problem?

According to Luján, many of the plans being cancelled are inferior plans that do not meet the stricter standards for coverage, and that alternate plans are available to people. He also cited the benefits of the ACA: no denial of coverage due to preexisting conditions, women no longer paying higher premiums than men and no lifetime caps.

Byrd claimed that families are paying $3,000 more a year for health insurance and that 4.7 million people have lost their insurance. He contended that tort reform, medical savings accounts and allowing interstate commerce for insurance providers should have been implemented instead of the ACA.

What, if anything, do the candidates think the federal government should be doing to cut down on the scientifically expected effects of climate change or to mitigate the difficulties we will face?

Byrd claimed the earth was still in an ice age, citing evidence that ice at the poles has increased in the last two years.

"Is there climate change? Sure. We have four seasons every year. Sometimes it gets wet, sometimes it gets dry, some years are colder than others. But is that directly attributed to man? That science has not been settled," Byrd said.

Luján praised LANL for its research on such things as rising sea levels. He also stated that what is happening in New Mexico, such as recent fires and impeded forest recovery afterwards, is "something we should be terrified about."

"When 97 percent of scientists across the country say that this is what the data reads, we should try to accept modeling associated with what it means and what they're trying to tell us," Luján said.

Luján's response was interrupted by two of Byrd's supporters. One walked out across the front of the auditorium declaring "I've had just about enough." The other loudly stated an expletive. The two candidates, meanwhile, were scheduled to meet Tuesday night in Santa Fe for a forum sponsored by the League of Women Voters. According to the Santa Fe New Mexican, Byrd himself walked out of the forum after giving his opening remarks. Byrd stated that he did not like the rules of the forum.

Bill seeks oversight of private colleges; King among 14 AGs endorsing measure

BYLINE: MIKE BUSH JOURNAL STAFF WRITER

SECTION: METRO & NEW MEXICO; Pg. C1

LENGTH: 512 words

A move by some congressional Democrats to strengthen oversight of private, for-profit colleges and universities got a boost this month when it was endorsed by 14 state attorneys general, including New Mexico's Gary King.

However, none of the state's five-member congressional delegation, including the two Democratic senators, has signed on.

Senate Bill 2204 was introduced in April by Sen. Dick Durbin of Illinois and has since picked up four co-sponsors - all Democrats. An identical bill, HR 4391, was introduced at the same time in the House of Representatives by Maryland's Elijah Cummings.

The legislation is called the Proprietary Education Oversight Coordination Improvement Act. With the House controlled by Republicans, chances of passage are doubtful. However, the letter of endorsement from the 14 attorneys general gave supporters added hope.

"The bill is both timely and necessary as each of our offices have encountered far too many former and current for-profit school students who have been harmed by the dishonest and unethical practices of some for-profit institutions," the letter stated.

Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., who represents northern New Mexico, said, "I will take a close look at the full impact this legislation would have. ... I appreciate the views of the Attorneys General, including Gary King, on this issue."

Reps. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., and Steve Pearce, R-N.M., did not respond to requests for comment.

The legislation would establish an interagency committee that would provide Congress with annual reports on for-profit colleges.

The panel also would be required to create a "For-Profit Warning List for Parents and Students" of schools that would include such phrasing as: engaged in illegal activities the previous year as determined by a state or federal court; entered into a settlement resulting in a monetary payment; had a higher education program withdrawn or suspended; "sufficient evidence of widespread or systemic unfair, deceptive, abusive, unethical, fraudulent, or predatory practices, policies, or procedures that threaten the academic success, financial security, or general best interest of students," according to a summary by the Congressional Research Library, a nonpartisan division of the Library of Congress.

The bills would also encourage information sharing among federal agencies and between federal and state offices.

In a statement, Durbin's office said for-profit colleges receive 20 percent of federal student loan funding but enroll 10 percent of all college students. Some Democrats have complained that for-profit colleges disproportionately take federal funds without providing students with valuable workforce skills.

David Urias, an Albuquerque attorney whose firm represents several former ITT Technical Institute nursing students in a lawsuit against the private school, said the legislation, as he understands it, is "something that is long overdue."

Sens. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., and Tom Udall, D-N.M., released statements indicating concern about the issue but not addressing the bill specifically.

Luján and rival Byrd face House race Round 2

BYLINE: Daniel J. Chacón, The Santa Fe New Mexican

SECTION: NATIONAL POLITICAL NEWS

LENGTH: 1165 words

Oct. 11--The race in New Mexico's 3rd Congressional District is a rematch from two years ago between incumbent Democrat Ben Ray Lujan and Republican challenger Jeff Byrd.

Lujan, of Nambe, is seeking a fourth term to represent Northern New Mexico in Congress. He said he has extensively traveled the district, which includes all or part of 16 counties and takes eight and a half hours to drive across, and he has worked on scores of constituent issues that don't make the news.

"You just do your best to represent everyone and be available," said Lujan, 42, the son of the late Ben Lujan, who was speaker of the New Mexico House of Representatives.

"Not everyone always agrees with your votes, but you're there to represent the entire district," he said. "My dad always told me, 'You need to make sure that you're able to come and explain your votes to your community, whether people agree with them or not.' "

Byrd, 43, a rancher from Tucumcari and a former environmental engineer, says Lujan does not deserve to be re-elected.

Byrd said the northern part of New Mexico is suffering with Lujan and his "progressive policies." Meantime, other parts of the state are flourishing, he said.

As an example, Byrd said mines in the Southern New Mexico congressional district are hiring. But a molybdenum mine in Questa closed this year, "sending New Mexicans back to a status of dependency on the government," Byrd said.

His approach to representing the district would be different from Lujan's, he said.

"I do not care nearly as much as the incumbent about partisan politics," Byrd said. "I want this district to focus on solutions to problems."

Lujan says he has been working on issues affecting New Mexico and has the record to prove it, from veterans' issues to acequias.

The 3rd Congressional District race this year also includes Republican Thomas Hook of Portales, who is running as a write-in. Hook is no fan of Lujan.

"He has failed all of us and needs to go," Hook wrote on his campaign website.

Despite the criticism from his opponents and others, Lujan is again considered by most to be a safe bet for re-election in the heavily Democratic district. He took 62 percent of the vote two years ago against Byrd.

Of New Mexico's three elections for the U.S. House of Representatives, most eyes are on the 2nd Congressional District race between incumbent Steve Pearce, a Republican from Hobbs, and Democratic challenger Roxanne "Rocky" Lara, an attorney from Carlsbad.

They have clogged television airwaves in recent weeks with hundreds of thousands of dollars in campaign ads. Pearce has more than $600,000 in TV ads scheduled through Nov. 4. He has spent more money on TV ads than any other political candidates in New Mexico during this election cycle except Republican Gov. Susana Martinez and Democratic U.S. Sen. Tom Udall.

"There's a reason why Congressman Pearce is spending the amounts that he is," Lujan said. "It's another one of those close, tight races in New Mexico."

Lujan said the election between Pearce and Lara has received a lot of attention nationally and could come down to the wire, though the incumbent is well established.

Pearce has been in Congress for all but two years since 2003. He gave up his House seat in 2008 to run for the U.S. Senate, a race that Pearce lost to Udall. Pearce won back his House seat in 2010.

The other U.S. House race is for the Albuquerque-based 1st Congressional District, which includes a sliver of Santa Fe County. It pits incumbent Michelle Lujan Grisham, a Democrat who was born in Los Alamos and raised in Santa Fe, against Republican challenger Michael Frese, a small-business owner from Corrales.

In the 3rd Congressional District race, Lujan not only has name recognition, in part because of his late father, but he has a big financial advantage. He has raised nearly $940,000 this election cycle and has about $581,500 cash on hand, according to filings with the Federal Election Commission.

Byrd has raised about $27,500 and has just over $9,100 cash on hand, according to campaign filings.

The Almanac of American Politics states that Lujan "is known as a hard worker who has diligently ascended in his party's ranks."

"Lujan has a liberal voting record, but he has not been as far to the left as Udall," the book states. "He sided with northern New Mexico ranchers in 2011 in their fight against the U.S. Forest Service over reducing cattle-grazing allotments within the Santa Fe and Carson National Forests, a position that dismayed state environmental groups. He joined the Congressional Progressive Caucus, but unlike some of its members, largely has steered clear of partisan rhetoric and concentrated on state-specific matters."

The Washington Post's U.S. Congress Votes Database shows that Lujan rarely breaks with his party, having voted with Democrats 93 percent of the time in his current term, the same as in 2012 but down from 99 percent during his first term.

Before seeking elected office, Lujan worked as chief financial officer at the state Department of Cultural Affairs and as deputy state treasurer.

His first foray into politics came in 2004 when he was elected to the New Mexico Public Regulation Commission. During his tenure, the commission developed regulations requiring utilities to get 20 percent of their energy from renewable sources, such as wind and solar, by 2020.

Lujan was also on the commission when it approved a rate increase for Public Service Company of New Mexico. The commission authorized rate increases totaling $34 million, about half of what the company was seeking.

Lujan made a bid for the U.S. House of Representatives when Udall gave up the seat to run for the Senate.

In a six-way House primary, Lujan won convincingly. He then took the general election with 54 percent of the vote. Since then, he has won handily in his re-election bids.

Byrd, as the underdog, is sticking to a simple campaign message: "We must change who we send to Washington in order to change the results," he said.

Lujan also wants to change some results. He said job creation is at the top of people's minds. Four years ago, New Mexico ranked 15th nationally in job creation, but the state is 49th today, he said.

"New Mexico has always been strong because the state has always worked as a family when it comes to our elected officials. ... It seems that we've fallen apart, sadly," he said.

Without naming names, Lujan made a pointed criticism of Gov. Martinez in that regard.

"When the film industry was attacked four years ago and there was actually a repeal of incentives, New Mexico lost a lot of job opportunities and the building of more sound studios, which would've led to more job creation. That's not good for the state. We need to do better there."

UDALL, HEINRICH: CITY OF ROSWELL TO RECEIVE $450,000 TO HELP EXPAND AIR TRAVEL SERVICE TO PHOENIX

Udall, Heinrich: City of Roswell to Receive $450,000 to Help Expand Air Travel Service to Phoenix

October 9, 2014

WASHINGTON - Today, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich announced $450,000 for the City of Roswell to support the community's efforts to begin nonstop air travel service from the Roswell Industrial Air Center Airport to the Phoenix Sky Harbor International Airport.

The grant, funded through the U.S. Department of Transportation's Small Community Air Service Development Program, will help add service between Roswell and Phoenix, which will provide passengers more timely connections to the west coast, and help to fuel economic growth in Southeast New Mexico. In July, Udall and Heinrich, along with U.S. Representatives Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham, sent a letter to the associate director of the Small Community Air Service Development Program, expressing their support for the City of Roswell's application for the grant.

"Adding air travel service between Roswell and Phoenix will not only help make travel more convenient for both New Mexico residents and visitors, but will also help create jobs and spur economic development throughout Southeast New Mexico," Udall said. "Access to all parts of our state is essential to fostering economic growth in rural communities, and I will continue to push for critical investments in New Mexico's air travel infrastructure."

"Transportation options and accessibility are key factors in attracting and keeping business in New Mexico. The new service that will be available in Roswell will make the region more marketable for all of those who would like to start or expand their businesses in southeastern New Mexico," Heinrich said. "Investments in an efficient and strong transportation system will help move New Mexico forward, spur job creation, and support our local economy."

As of July, 78 percent of Roswell area travelers drove to other airports to begin their travel, which increased the time and cost of travel from the area. Currently, passengers wishing to fly to the west coast from Roswell to must fly 400 miles east to the Dallas/Ft. Worth International Airport before flying to the west. Expanded service will eliminate this inefficiency, providing New Mexicans and visitors with a better and more timely air travel experience.

New Mexico Delegation Welcomes President's Disaster Declaration for Summer Floods

LENGTH: 583 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the Senator Tom Udall, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Representatives Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Luján, and Michelle Lujan Grisham announced that President Obama has declared a major disaster for the state of New Mexico for the severe storms and flooding from July 27 - August 5.

The declaration means the president has ordered federal aid to help state, tribal, and local recovery efforts. The first round of assistance will be available on a cost-sharing basis for damage to public infrastructure in Guadalupe, Rio Arriba, and San Miguel counties and the Pueblo of Acoma. Assistance for Bernalillo, Sandoval, and Otero counties is still being evaluated, and federal funding will also be made available on a cost-sharing basis to assist with hazard mitigation statewide.

New Mexico's lawmakers on Oct. 2 jointly urged the president to respond quickly to the request for disaster assistance for the state of New Mexico. The severe summer storms and flooding damaged roads, bridges, a dam structure, and other infrastructure. According to Governor Susana Martinez's letter requesting the major disaster declaration, damages resulting from these storms have currently been assessed at $3.93 million. The greatest overall damage occurred at the Acoma Pueblo, where access to the backcountry was cut off for residents and users.

"For our communities that sustained severe damage to roads, bridges, dams and other structures, the federal assistance that comes with this disaster declaration will go a long way in recovery efforts," Udall said. "I am also monitoring the recovery efforts from September floods in Eddy County and other parts of Southeastern New Mexico, and will continue working to ensure the federal government fulfills its obligations to help with restoration in New Mexico's communities."

"I'm pleased the President responded to our request to take prompt action on the State's application for a disaster declaration. This means much-needed federal aid will now go to New Mexico communities recovering from the severe storms and devastating floods over the summer that damaged roads, bridges, and other critical infrastructure," Heinrich said. "My office will continue to offer support and I will keep working to ensure the affected areas of our state receive the federal assistance they need in order to rebuild."

"This disaster declaration and assistance will allow our hardest-hit communities to recover from the devastating impact of these storms," Pearce said. "Southern counties are continuing to deal with the aftermath of road closures and infrastructure repair. I will work to ensure counties receive the federal assistance they need to move forward and rebuild."

"As a result of the President's declaration, communities that have been hit hard will have resources that are critical to the recovery from damage caused by severe storms and flooding," Luján said. "This prompt action comes as communities are pulling together to rebuild and will help them take steps to prepare and protect against future flooding."

"I appreciate the action by FEMA to pledge assistance to the hardest-hit communities, including the Pueblo of Acoma," Lujan Grisham said. "I am hopeful for a quick decision to extend federal assistance for flood damage in Bernalillo and other counties affected by this storm."

New Mexico Delegation Welcomes Selection of Photonics Manufacturing For Next Department Of Defense Innovation Institute Competition

LENGTH: 838 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the Senator Tom Udall, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Representatives Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Luján, and Michelle Lujan Grisham welcomed an announcement by the White House to award more than $200 million in public and private investment to create an Integrated Photonics Manufacturing Institute, led by the Department of Defense (DoD), and the second of four new institute competitions to be launched this year. This selection comes just four months after the delegation wrote a letter to Secretary of Defense Chuck Hagel expressing their strong support for the Department of Defense's manufacturing innovation institute competition, and requesting that the DoD choose the development of an advanced photonics manufacturing hub in the United States as their next manufacturing institute.

"I have been pushing the Department of Defense to focus special attention on developing a photonics manufacturing hub, and this announcement is great opportunity for New Mexico," Udall said. "Advanced photonics technologies are already spurring innovation in such diverse areas as medical imaging, national security, and robotics. New Mexico's extensive expertise among its business, military and scientific communities puts our state in a prime position to compete for this opportunity and create high quality manufacturing jobs."

"This is welcome news. New Mexico is uniquely positioned to house the nation's first advanced photonics manufacturing hub. With our private companies, universities, national labs, research facilities, and immeasurable talent and expertise in optics and photonics technologies, New Mexico is--without a doubt--a natural fit," Heinrich said. In July, Heinrich introduced an amendment to the Fiscal Year 2015 National Defense Authorization Act in support of establishing a DoD photonics hub. "Photonics technologies developed in New Mexico are used in our scientific, medical, and intelligence communities - giving headway for advanced research in robotics, biometric security, and the defense industry. Establishing a regional photonics hub in New Mexico will bridge the gap between applied research and product development and lead our nation's effort to attract investment and develop this technology. I am committed to help bring this opportunity to New Mexico."

"New Mexico has continuously shown it is at the forefront of research and development of advanced and emerging technologies," Pearce said. "Secretary Hagel's announcement is great news for New Mexicans all across the state, as it provides New Mexico a tremendous opportunity to continue its leadership in technological development. The investment into New Mexico facilities and businesses this partnership provides, will increase resources and allow our state to maintain a competitive stance in industry. I look forward to working closely with the Department of Defense in the near future to develop and secure the photonics manufacturing hub. Working together, I am confident that New Mexico will remain a leader in developing technology."

"New Mexico offers a wealth of resources, ranging from our national labs and universities to our innovative private companies and entrepreneurs, which make it uniquely situated to lead in photonics manufacturing," Luján said. "Already, New Mexico is contributing to developments in this important field that play an essential role in robotics, medical imaging, biometric security, and more. Further investments in these efforts will enhance our region's and nation's ability to maintain a competitive edge in such critical sectors."

"There's a lot of election-year debate about the role of the federal government in job creation," Lujan Grisham said. "This type of federal investment in photonics technologies developed in New Mexico is a perfect example of the public-private partnerships we should be aggressively pursuing in order to move our economy forward."

The Integrated Photonics Manufacturing Institute is expected to comprise the largest federal investment to date, reflecting the complexity of this technology, its importance to national security, and its revolutionary potential.

The Administration launched an initiative in 2013 to create a network of manufacturing innovation institutes across the country, which would serve as regional hubs to bridge the gap between applied research and product development. By bringing together companies, universities, and federal agencies, the nation can invest in the production of key technologies, such as advanced photonics, and encourage investment and production in the United States.

Udall and Lujan Grisham are cosponsors of the Revitalize American Manufacturing and Innovation Act to establish a more extensive network of centers for manufacturing innovation. The legislation passed the House in September and is pending consideration by the Senate.

White House announcement raises hopes for New Mexico

BYLINE: Gary Gerew

LENGTH: 359 words

New Mexico's federal representatives said they were very pleased with an announcement by the White House that it will direct more than $200 million to the creation an Integrated Photonics Manufacturing Institute.

The project, which will be led by the Department of Defense, is the second of four such institutes to be launched this year.

The announcement follows the sending of a letter signed by the delegation - Sen. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and Reps. Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Luján, and Michelle Lujan Grisham to Secretary of Defense Chuck Hagel, urging him to choose the development of an advanced photonics manufacturing hub in the United States as their next manufacturing institute.

"I have been pushing the Department of Defense to focus special attention on developing a photonics manufacturing hub, and this announcement is great opportunity for New Mexico," Udall said in a statement. "Advanced photonics technologies are already spurring innovation in such diverse areas as medical imaging, national security, and robotics. New Mexico's extensive expertise among its business, military and scientific communities puts our state in a prime position to compete for this opportunity and create high quality manufacturing jobs."

"New Mexico has continuously shown it is at the forefront of research and development of advanced and emerging technologies," Pearce said. "Secretary Hagel's announcement is great news for New Mexicans all across the state, as it provides New Mexico a tremendous opportunity to continue its leadership in technological development. The investment into New Mexico facilities and businesses this partnership provides, will increase resources and allow our state to maintain a competitive stance in industry.

The Integrated Photonics Manufacturing Institute is expected to comprise the largest federal investment to date, according to a statement issued by the delegation.

New Mexico Dems hail photonics funding

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) - New Mexico's Democratic congressional delegation is applauding an announcement that more than $200 million will be invested in a new federal integrated photonics facility led by the U.S. Department of Defense.

U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham said Saturday they welcomed plans for a photonics manufacturing hub in the U.S. and the second of four new institute competitions.

The delegation wrote Defense Secretary Chuck Hagel in June underlining their support for the department to create a network of manufacturing innovation institutes across the country.

They say New Mexico's extensive expertise makes it a natural location for additional national investment in research and manufacturing of optics and photonics technologies.

Photonics technologies are used in robotics and other fields.

New Mexico Delegation Requests Expedited Major Disaster Declaration for Summer Floods

LENGTH: 395 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of the Senator Martin Heinrich, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Today, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Representatives Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Luján, and Michelle Lujan Grisham sent a letter to President Obama, urging him to take prompt action on the State of New Mexico's recent request for a major disaster declaration to assist with damage that occurred throughout the state during storms and flooding in July and August.

Between July 27 and August 5, parts of New Mexico including Bernalillo, Guadalupe, Otero, Rio Arriba, Sandoval, and San Miguel counties, and the Pueblos of Acoma and Santo Domingo experienced severe storms and flooding that damaged roads, bridges, a dam structure, and other infrastructure. The state has requested the federal government approve a major disaster declaration request and provide the correlated public assistance to help with recovery efforts and repairs, which would include funding for debris removal; emergency protective measures; and repairs to damaged roads and bridges, water control facilities, buildings and equipment, utilities, and parks and recreation facilities.

According to Governor Susana Martinez's letter requesting the major disaster declaration, dated September 29, 2014, damages resulting from these storms have currently been assessed at $3.93 million. The greatest overall damage occurred at the Acoma Pueblo, where access to the backcountry was cut off for residents and users.

"In light of the ongoing losses and possible long-term impacts from flooding during the time period of July 27 through August 5, 2014, we request your expedited attention to Governor Martinez's request for a major disaster designation and the correlated public assistance," the lawmakers wrote. "We remain committed to providing the necessary assistance to you and the governor in expediting New Mexico's recovery efforts and ensuring an effective response from this extreme weather event."

Extreme weather conditions last month also caused significant damage in Southeastern New Mexico as well. The lawmakers will continue to support recovery efforts for areas of the state impacted by more recent storms and flooding, upon submission of disaster declaration requests.

New Mexico's congressional delegation has sent a letter to President Barack Obama urging quick action on the state's recent request for a major disaster declaration to help tackle the damages that occurred throughout the state during storms and flooding in July and August.

The letter was signed by U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, both Democrats, and U.S. Reps. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., and Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M.

Parts of New Mexico, including Bernalillo, Guadalupe, Otero, Rio Arriba, Sandoval and San Miguel counties and the Pueblos of Acoma and Santo Domingo - between July 27 and Aug. 5 - experienced severe storms and flooding that damaged roads, bridges, a dam structure and other infrastructure.

New Mexico asked for public assistance, including: funding for debris removal; emergency protective measures; and repairs to damaged roads and bridges, water control facilities, buildings and equipment, utilities and parks and recreation facilities, the delegation said in a news release.

Gov. Susana Martinez's letter requesting the declaration, dated Sept. 29, said the damages resulting from these storms have currently been assessed at $3.93 million.

The greatest overall damage occurred at the Acoma Pueblo, where access to the backcountry was cut off for residents and users.

Extreme weather conditions last month also caused significant damage in southeastern New Mexico. The lawmakers said they will continue to support recovery efforts for areas of the state impacted by more recent storms and flooding, upon submission of disaster declaration requests.

New Mexico Delegation Requests Expedited Major Disaster Declaration for Summer Floods; 'Prompt action' urged to help state recover from severe storm damage; Sen. Martin Heinrich (D-NM) News Release

The Honorable Barack Obama

President of the United States of America

The White House

1600 Pennsylvania Ave. NW

Washington, DC 20500

Dear President Obama:

We appreciate your past responsiveness to the State of New Mexico when our communities have sought federal disaster assistance as drought, fire, and extreme weather have threatened public safety and property. We again respectfully request that you take prompt action on the State of New Mexico's recent request for major disaster declaration as a result of severe storms and flooding that occurred July 27 through August 5, 2014.

As Governor Martinez indicated in her letter of September 29, 2014, damages resulting from severe storms have been assessed at $3.93 million, or $1.91 per capita. The bulk of damage was to roads and bridges throughout the state, but other infrastructure and natural resources were also heavily damaged. The greatest overall damage occurred at the Acoma Pueblo, where access to the backcountry was cut off for residents and users. Additionally, Santo Domingo Pueblo and the counties of Rio Arriba, San Miguel, Otero, and Guadalupe experienced severe damage to roads and other infrastructure.

In light of the ongoing losses and possible long-term impacts from flooding during the time period of July 27 through August 5, 2014, we request your expedited attention to Governor Martinez's request for a major disaster designation and the correlated public assistance, specifically categories A through G. We remain committed to providing the necessary assistance to you and the governor in expediting New Mexico's recovery efforts and ensuring an effective response from this extreme weather event.

Cancer survivor lobbies congressional leaders

BYLINE: Elizabeth HardinBurrola Independent correspondent

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. 2

LENGTH: 703 words

DATELINE: GALLUP

GALLUP -- Joyce Graves, a local cancer survivor, has spent the past 20 years as a volunteer assisting and supporting area residents battling cancer.

Last month, however, Graves switched gears and focused her energy on New Mexico's members of Congress who have the power to help fund that battle.

Graves traveled to Washington to attend the annual American Cancer Society Cancer Action Network Leadership Summit Sept. 14-17. As part of the summit, Graves and hundreds of other volunteers from across the country -- along with staff members of the American Cancer Society Cancer Action Network, known as ACS CAN -- lobbied lawmakers to protect cancer research and prevention funding, endorse legislation that supports patients' quality of life, and ensure colon cancer screenings are affordable for senior citizens.

"It was empowering to me to know I can do something like that," Graves, a retired Gallup teacher, said of the experience in an interview Wednesday.

Federal funding

ACS CAN is the nonprofit, nonpartisan advocacy affiliate organization of the American Cancer Society. It works to encourage lawmakers, candidates and government officials to support laws and policies that will make cancer prevention and research a national priority.

Graves attended the summit with three other volunteers and two ACS CAN staffers from New Mexico. During their time in the nation's capital, they met with staffers from the offices of Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, Sen. Martin Heinrich and Sen. Tom Udall.

The lawmakers were urged to increase funding for cancer research at the National Cancer Institute and for prevention programs at the U.S. Centers for Disease Control. According to ACS CAN, freezes and cuts in federal funding have jeopardized continued progress in the prevention, detection and treatment of cancer.

Graves said those funding cuts have happened during a time when many cancer research projects have been on the edge of important breakthroughs.

"This is not the time to back off ...," Graves said. "We're talking saving lives here -- we've just got to do that."

Legislative support

Graves said lawmakers were also asked to support three specific pieces of legislation. The "Patient Centered Quality Care for Life Act" (HR1666) and the "Palliative Care and Hospice Education and Training Act" (HR1339 & S641) propose the expansion of palliative care, which is specialized medical care that focuses on care coordination and relief from pain, stress and other symptoms of treatment for life-threatening diseases.

The "Removing Barriers to Colorectal Cancer Screening Act" (HR1070 and S2348) would correct a provision in the Affordable Care Act. Currently, senior citizens relying on Medicare receive unexpected charges after having a colonoscopy in which a polyp is discovered. According to ACS CAN, this wasn't the intent of the health care law, and it is serious screening disincentive.

Grisham had already signed as a co-sponsor for all three bills, and Lujan had signed on the first two. Heinrich is a Senate co-sponsor of the "Palliative Care and Hospice Education and Training Act."

Lending a voice

Volunteering with ACS CAN has presented Graves with new challenges. Graves said she knew it was important to talk to government leaders about cancer issues, but until her involvement with the advocacy organization she didn't really feel like she was a "political person."

"'Joyce, you don't have to be a political person,'" Graves recalled ACS CAN staff partner Cynthia Serna telling her. "'This is a way to let your voice be heard.'"

Graves said anyone who cares about cancer prevention and research should consider joining ASC CAN and lending their voice to the fight against the disease. They can sign up to receive email alerts about important legislation, and the organization provides information about writing government officials. Membership is $10.

"It's an easy way to make legislative differences," Graves said, adding she has learned that more personalized emails and letters tend to be more effective.

"I'm not a scientific person. I can't find a cure ... but I can get some research money for those who can," Graves said.

President Obama Signs Tribal General Welfare Act into Law

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 386 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The Navajo Nation Washington Office, a federally-recognized Native American tribe, issued the following news release:

On Sept. 26, President Barack Obama signed HR 3043, the Tribal General Welfare Exclusion Act (http://navajonationwashingtonoffice.createsend1.com/t/r-l-mkuiild-l-s/), into law.

The Navajo Nation supported the act through council resolution and strongly advocated for its passage.

The passage of the act was an extraordinary demonstration of bipartisan support in the 113th U.S. Congress. It was sponsored in the House by Rep. Devin Nunes, R-Calif.

It was co-sponsored by 61 House members including Reps. Paul Gosar, R-Ariz., Raul Grijalva, D-Ariz., Ann Kirkpatrick, D-Ariz., Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., and David Schweikert, R-Ariz.

The measure was sponsored in the Senate by Sens. Jerry Moran, R-Kan., and Heidi Heitkamp, D-N.D., and was co-sponsored by Sens. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., and Tom Udall, D-N.M.

The act supports tribal self-determination and sovereignty. In recent times, tribal governments have been unfairly subjected to intrusive and overreaching examinations by the Internal Revenue Service that do not similarly scrutinize similar state-run assistance programs.

Now, pursuant to the act, tribal governments have the ability to decide what services and programs best meet the needs of their communities without the fear that the IRS will audit and fine them.

It also gives ease of mind to the recipients of the assistance programs that they will not have personal income tax levied on the value of the assistance they receive.

Importantly, the act directs the secretary of the Treasury to establish a Tribal Advisory Committee to advise the secretary on matters relating the taxation of tribal governments.

It also requires the training and education of IRS agents on federal Indian law and implementation of the act.

Lastly, it will temporarily suspends the audits and examinations of the general welfare assistance programs run by tribes until the implementation and training is completed.

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following video in honor of Hispanic Heritage Month.

"This is an exciting time for the Hispanic community. Every year from September 15th to October 15th, America comes together to celebrate Hispanic Heritage Month. It represents an opportunity to reflect on the enduring contributions of a community that has strengthened the fabric of a nation.

I encourage the community to continue to seize the opportunity to contribute their voices to the most important policy discussions that impact our future. From education and energy, to immigration, the economy and more - the perspectives and contributions of the Hispanic community will continue to make America stronger.

Lujan Statement on Amendment Authorizing Training and Equipping of Rebel Groups in Syria

LENGTH: 402 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting against an amendment to a Continuing Resolution that authorized the training and equipping of rebel groups in Syria. Luján voted for the Continuing Resolution that is needed to prevent the government from shutting down at the end of September.

"ISIL poses a threat to the Middle East and has the potential to threaten our homeland if it is not addressed. I support efforts to use targeted airstrikes and intelligence to help degrade ISIL's ability to gain the money and weapons that enhance their destructive capabilities. However, I have serious concerns with the current plan to equip and train Syrian rebels. Countries in the Middle East must take a leading role against this threat in their own region. Our allies in the region must prove that they are willing to stand up and commit the resources necessary to complement the United States. A major focus must be ending the flow of money and the recruitment of fighters that are supporting ISIL. Until our allies fully commit to this effort, I have concerns that remain with the current plan. To date it is not clear our allies have fully committed to this plan and ending the flow of money to ISIL.

"While the amendment calls for the vetting and reporting on every person recruited for training, it does not prevent individuals with ties to extremist or terrorist groups from participating. I am also concerned that the conflict in the region has the potential to escalate and further entangle our country in a civil war in Syria. While the purpose of training Syrians is to combat ISIL, and not the Assad regime, if Assad's forces target the rebels, we will be faced with the prospect of engaging the regime and escalating this conflict. In addition, the Syrians may end up turning their focus to overthrowing the Assad regime instead of concentrating on ISIL.

"While I opposed the amendment, I voted on the underlying bill - the Continuing Resolution - that prevents another government shutdown. The process should have included separate votes and debate on the training of Syrian rebels and the Continuing Resolution."

Albuquerque Journal (New Mexico)

September 28, 2014 Sunday

For Luján, job creation is the primary mission

BYLINE: Copyright © 2014 Albuquerque Journal BY MICHAEL COLEMAN JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: DIMENSION; Pg. C6

LENGTH: 929 words

WASHINGTON - When Rep. Ben Ray Luján looks at New Mexico's neighbors - Colorado, Texas, Utah and Arizona - he sees new jobs he wishes were materializing in his own state.

That's at least in part why the 42-year-old Democrat said he's seeking a fourth term representing northern New Mexico's 3rd Congressional District.

"We see (other states) continuing to benefit from job expansion in large numbers and New Mexico is still in the red," Luján said. "We want to bring attention to those issues and shine a light on what's happening in New Mexico and try to make a difference. There is a lot of work to do. We've laid a foundation and we want to continue to be able to work on it."

Luján, a Santa Fe native and former New Mexico Public Regulation commissioner, faces Republican Jefferson Byrd, a rancher from Tucumcari, in the Nov. 4 general election. Democrats outnumber Republicans by nearly 2-to-1 in the congressional district.

Luján, whose late father, Ben Lujan, was a Democratic speaker of the New Mexico House of Representatives, is ranked as the 117th most-liberal member of the 435-member U.S. House. He supports gay marriage and abortion rights.

Luján said he's trying to take a legislative approach to job creation in northern New Mexico, especially by aiming to help Los Alamos National Laboratory work with the private sector to launch new businesses.

Luján has proposed a bill that would authorize $20 million per year for five years to cover the government's share of the lab's Cooperative Research and Development Agreements - or CRADAs - with small, innovative companies. That cost is now assumed entirely by the businesses, some of which are reluctant to assume that much risk.

"More and more Republicans seem to be open to that," he said. "These CRADAs create more public-private partnerships with the national labs, which helps us with U.S. competitiveness. It would spin off more opportunity for more interaction with local businesses and tech startups."

Luján also has proposed restructuring the National Nuclear Security Administration, which oversees the national laboratories, including Sandia in Albuquerque, to create a better balance between nuclear weapons work and non-defense-related research and development.

"Our amendment would look at the governance structure there and how we can support the missions at the national labs," he said. "The reason these labs are there is to conduct not only national security but to conduct the research and development that is critical to the United States' economy and the safety of our country. It seems to me that is what the NNSA should be fully supporting."

As vice chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus, Luján has an influential voice in the nation's ongoing immigration debate.

He has consistently advocated for a so-called path to citizenship for the roughly 11.5 million immigrants now living in the U.S. illegally. He also supports the DREAM Act, which would allow people who were brought to the United States illegally as children to apply for citizenship.

In the current debate over how to deal with thousands of child refugees arriving at the Mexican border from Central America, Luján has been among the most outspoken members of Congress in advocating for compassion.

"We have a responsibility to these children," Luján said. "We can't lose sight that this is a humanitarian crisis. It's been said a lot, but sadly, I don't know that everyone understands what is happening to these kids and what they are fleeing."

At the same time, Luján said, even more local issues, such as working to secure money for acequias, or community-owned water and irrigation channels, in northern New Mexico, also rank high on his agenda.

"We've been working on our land grants and acequias; on requirements for consultation when it comes to public lands designations where acequias and land grants are. It's important for local communities to be at the table."

Luján said that partly because of his efforts in Congress, there are now four federal funding streams open to acequias that were previously available only to private landholders.

"Federal funding will be available to New Mexico acequia members, and the associations are actually developing the rules surrounding this," he said.

If re-elected, Luján said, he would also work to protect New Mexico's agricultural heritage. The state is among the nation's largest beef and cheese producers and stands to benefit more as chile, wine and pecan exports pick up.

"We're seeing more microbreweries and wineries and more value in our agriculture," Luján said. "We need to look after our crops."

Asked to cite the most important thing he's learned after three terms in Congress, Luján said it's all about relationships on Capitol Hill.

"It's the importance of getting to know more people - more Democrats, more Republicans, different ideas, different philosophies," he said. "Those interpersonal relationships are critically important."

He said that historically, the most effective New Mexico leaders have found ways to work across partisan divides.

"The way they were able to be successful on behalf of new Mexicans is they were conveners of people," Luján said. "I've learned how important that really is." Ben Ray Luján

Hispanic heritage no secret in New Mexico

BYLINE: Dan Herrera

LENGTH: 847 words

While living in California back in the late '80s, I was always somewhat amused by the excitement displayed by my Hispanic friends there whenever someone who shared our ethnicity ran for office - not won, just ran.

I found it funny because as a native New Mexican I've always known of people in power who were Hispanic, lots of them. And the prominence of Hispanic leadership in this state far preceded my own existence.

While political conditions for Hispanic candidates have improved a bit in California, it was actually a recent Albuquerque Hispano Chamber of Commerce luncheon that got me thinking about how normal it is for Hispanics in New Mexico to hold positions of political power. The event was the group's annual celebration of Hispanic Heritage Month.

I think it was comedian Jimmie Walker - J.J. from the TV show "Good Times" - whom I first heard complain that February was designated as Black History Month because it's the shortest month of the year.

Well, at least that celebration is all in a single month. Hispanic Heritage Month runs from Sept. 15 through Oct. 15.

But just as there is a legitimate reason Black History Month wound up in short February - its origins have to do with the birthdays of Abraham Lincoln (Feb. 12) and Frederick Douglass (Feb. 14) - there is also a reasonable reason the month to honor all things Hispanic in the U.S. actually laps over two months.

It started out as Hispanic Heritage Week, approved by President Lyndon Johnson on Sept. 17, 1968, but was expanded to 30 days by President Ronald Reagan in 1988. Sept. 15 became the start date because Guatemala, El Salvador, Nicaragua, Honduras and Costa Rica all declared independence from Spain on that date in 1821. And in 1810, Mexico declared independence from Spain on Sept. 16 and Chile on Sept. 18. And Belize declared independence from the United Kingdom on Sept. 21, 1981. (What is it about September?) The October connection recognizes explorer Christopher Columbus' world-changing landing in the Bahamas on Oct. 12, 1492.

It's not really part of the official Hispanic Heritage Month designation, but if you're looking for a New Mexico connection it can be noted that on Sept. 21, 1595, King Philip II of Spain awarded New Mexico's founder and first governor, Don Juan de Oñate, a contract to settle New Mexico.

OK, I realize New Mexico was already settled by Puebloans and other Indian tribes. Native American Heritage Month is November, which has 30 days.

But back to powerful New Mexico Hispanic political figures. Granted, all of New Mexico's governors under Spain and Mexico were Hispanic. But two Hispanics were governors before U.S. statehood. They were Donaciano Vigil, 1847-1848, who called for a public school system open to the poor as well as the rich; and Miguel Antonio Otero, 1897-1906, a Republican for whom Otero County was named.

After statehood, two Hispanics were among the first of New Mexico's governors: Ezequiel Cabeza De Baca, 1917, a Democrat who died after just two months in office; and Octaviano Larrazolo, 1919-1921, a Republican under whom a state board of health was established. He was also the first Hispanic American to be elected to the U.S. Senate.

It took quite a while for a Hispanic candidate to again be elected governor, though several tried. But consider that four of the past seven governors have been Hispanic.

They are Democrats Jerry Apodaca, 1975-1979; Toney Anaya, 1983-1987; Bill Richardson, 2003-2011; and Republican Susana Martinez, 2011-current. Martinez is also the first Hispanic woman in the United States to be elected governor. While Larrazolo was the first Hispanic U.S. senator, he served just over a year and then retired because of ill health. However, another New Mexican, Democrat Dennis Chavez, 1935-1962, was a giant of a senator who is credited with pioneering legislation that ultimately led to the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The work of Democratic Sen. Joseph Montoya, 1964-1977, on the Joint Committee on Atomic Energy and the Senate Appropriations Committee helped strengthen federal installations in New Mexico. In the U.S. House of Representatives since territorial days, New Mexico has sent to Washington: Jose Manuel Gallegos, Miguel A. Otero, Francisco Perea, Jose Francisco Chaves, Trinidad Romero, Mariano S. Otero, Tranquilino Luna, Francisco Manzanares, Pedro Perea, Benigno Hernandez, Nestor Montoya, Dennis Chavez, Antonio Fernandez, Joseph Montoya, ManuelLujan Jr., Bill Richardson, Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham. Of these, nine were Democrats and nine were Republicans, although the Democrats have dominated since the Great Depression. In total, that's quite a number. And it doesn't include Supreme Court justices, state legislative leadership, mayors, university presidents, generals and people in other positions of high honor. So whatever your heritage, as New Mexicans all of us have quite a bit to commemorate during Hispanic Heritage Month. UpFront is a daily front-page news and opinion column. LENGTH: 229 words

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. (3rd CD), issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following video in honor of Hispanic Heritage Month.

"This is an exciting time for the Hispanic community. Every year from September 15th to October 15th, America comes together to celebrate Hispanic Heritage Month. It represents an opportunity to reflect on the enduring contributions of a community that has strengthened the fabric of a nation.

"As the fastest growing ethnic group, the future of our country is increasingly in the hands of Hispanic families and communities. I encourage the community to continue to seize the opportunity to contribute their voices to the most important policy discussions that impact our future. From education and energy, to immigration, the economy and more - the perspectives and contributions of the Hispanic community will continue to make America stronger.

"This month, as we gather to recognize the Hispanic community and our rich culture and traditions - from the way we speak and the food we eat to our values and principals and intellectual contributions - let us embrace them all. I look forward to celebrating the history and numerous contributions of the Hispanic community this month, and encourage you to do the same."

NM senators support plan to arm 'moderate' rebels

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN Journal Washington Bureau

SECTION: EDITORIALS; Pg. B2

LENGTH: 744 words

New Mexico's U.S. senators this week put their weight behind an effort to train and arm so-called "moderate" Syrian rebels in the fight against Islamic State, the murderous terror group threatening to further destabilize the Middle East.

Sens. Tom Udall, a Democrat who sits on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, and Martin Heinrich, also a Democrat, both voted for the measure.

For more than a year, Udall has voiced grave concerns about arming amorphous Islamic rebel groups that may not be reliable U.S. allies. Nevertheless, the senator held his nose and voted yes last week, citing his home state's interests. That's because the bill to arm the rebels, approved 78-22, contained money to avert another government shutdown back home.

"It's the right thing for New Mexico's economy and it supports jobs," Udall said of his vote. "New Mexico cannot afford another government shutdown and (Wednesday's) vote took the threat off the table."

Udall said the bill "includes critical funding for New Mexico's national labs and (military) bases, and ... allows the Waste Isolation Pilot Plant the flexibility it needs" to recover from a February accident at the site. But Udall warned that arming the rebels might be a dumb move.

"I am deeply skeptical about the strategy for arming rebels in Syria and the possibility of further entangling our troops in a religious war in the Middle East," he said. "I was not willing to risk a government shutdown, weakening our security and risking New Mexico's still-fragile economy over Senate process."

Udall issued a similar warning a year ago, when he clashed sharply with U.S. Secretary of State John Kerry over a resolution to approve use of U.S. force and arm Syrian rebels against the murderous regime of Syrian President Bashar al-Assad. The circumstances are somewhat different today, but the worries are the same.

"Some of the rebels share our values and want an open society," Udall said at the time. "Many others are allied with al-Qaida - and a greater threat to the United States than President Assad ever was. U.S. military involvement, no matter the limits at this point, will likely only pull us toward greater involvement. And with no clear end game."

The Obama administration has said it will give weapons only to Syrian rebels who are "vetted" by the CIA. There's no word on exactly how they'll conduct those background checks.

Meanwhile, Heinrich didn't seem to share the deep concerns Udall had about arming the rebels.

"President Obama's strategy to degrade and destroy ISIL is a sound policy given the very real threat they pose," he said after the vote.

But Heinrich also said Congress should approve a new Authorization of Use of Military Force - an AUMF in Beltway shorthand - to make clear the will of the American people.

"I believe it is past time for Congress to reassert its constitutional authority by passing a new and more narrow authorization of use of military force that repeals the 2002 Iraq War AUMF language, and replaces it with a more limited and up-to-date authorization," he said.

Heinrich has co-sponsored a Senate bill that would repeal the 2002 agreement for war in Iraq and replace it with a new one that is much narrower in scope.

"The president must make his case to Congress if he believes we need to use military force beyond counter-terrorism strikes against ISIS and Congress should debate an authorization to use force," he said.

The Senate vote last week was far from the typical party line, with senators as diverse as Rand Paul, Elizabeth Warren and Ted Cruz voting against it.

The House voted a day earlier to approve equipping the Syrian rebels but, unlike in the Senate, their vote was separate from the domestic spending bill. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan voted against arming the rebels, while Reps. Steve Pearce and Michelle Lujan Grisham voted for it. Lujan said he supports air strikes against ISIS, but has "serious concerns" about handing over U.S. arms to the rebels.

"While the amendment calls for the vetting and reporting on every person recruited for training, it does not prevent individuals with ties to extremist or terrorist groups from participating," Lujan said. "I am also concerned that the conflict in the region has the potential to escalate and further entangle our country in a civil war in Syria."

President Obama signed the bill to train and arm the rebels on Friday.

Congressional Votes for New Mexico the Week of 09/12 - 09/18/2014

BYLINE: by TARGETED NEWS SERVICE, Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 3082 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON, Sept. 21 -- There were 11 key votes in the House this week; the House held a total of 19 roll call votes in the week ending Thursday. There were five key votes in the Senate, which held a total of nine votes. The most important House and Senate votes were to pass a continuing appropriations resolution that will fund government operations until December 11.

In addition to roll call votes, the House and Senate also took action on several measures by voice vote. The House also passed a resolution (H. Res. 726), sponsored by Rep. Jim Gerlach, R-Pa., to strongly support the right of the people of Ukraine to freely determine their future, including their country's relationship with other nations and international organizations, without interference, intimidation, or coercion by other countries; the Preserving Welfare for Needs Not Weed Act (H.R. 4137), sponsored by Rep. David G. Reichert, R-Wash., to prohibit assistance for temporary assistance for needy families provided by block grants to states from being accessed by using electronic benefit transfer cards (EBTs) at any store that sells marijuana; a bill (H.R. 5418), sponsored by Rep. Charles W. Boustany Jr., R-La., to prohibit officers and employees of the Internal Revenue Service from using personal email accounts to conduct official business; and the Veterans' Compensation Cost-of-Living Adjustment Act (S. 2258), sponsored by Sen. Mark Begich, D-Alaska, to provide for a cost of living increase, effective December 1, 2014, in the rates of compensation for veterans with service-connected disabilities and for survivors of certain disabled veterans.

The Senate also passed the Defense Production Act (H.R. 4809), sponsored by Rep. John Campbell, R-Calif., to reauthorize through 2019 the Defense Production Act, which authorizes the federal government to reach contracts for delivery of products from a company as required in emergencies; the Traumatic Brain Injury Reauthorization Act (S. 2539), sponsored by Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, to reauthorize certain programs relating to traumatic brain injury and to trauma research; the Government Reports Elimination Act (H.R. 4194), sponsored by Rep. Darrell E. Issa, R-Calif., to eliminate or modify federal government reporting requirements; and the BLM Permit Processing Improvement Act (S. 2440), sponsored by Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., to expand and extend the program to improve permitting coordination by the Bureau of Land Management.

Here's a look at how area members of Congress voted over the previous week.

HOUSE VOTES:

House Vote 1:

PRO BONO INTELLECTUAL PROPERTY LITIGATION: The House has passed a bill (H.R. 5108), sponsored by Rep. Hakeem S. Jeffries, D-N.Y, to permanently establish the Law School Clinic Certification Program at the U.S. Patent and Trademark Office, with the program's purpose being to allow students in law school clinics to do pro bono patent and trademark litigation before the Office on behalf of impoverished inventors and entrepreneurs. Jeffries said making the program permanent would have the dual benefit of giving law students real-world professional training in intellectual property law and helping inventors and entrepreneurs navigate the complex patent and trademark filing process as they work to bring their beneficial products to market. The vote, on Sept. 15, was 327 yeas to 22 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st)

NOT VOTING: Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 2:

EMERGENCY MEDICAL CARE FOR CHILDREN: The House has passed the Emergency Medical Services for Children Reauthorization Act (S. 2154), sponsored by Sen. Robert P. Casey, D-Pa. The bill would reauthorize the Emergency Medical Services for Children Program through fiscal 2019, providing $20 million annually in grants to improve pediatric emergency care. A supporter, Rep. Joseph R. Pitts, R-Pa., said the program would help hospitals integrate care for children into their emergency medical service systems and thereby reduce child mortality by improving the ability of hospitals to provide the unique care required for children. The vote, on Sept. 16, was 410 yeas to 4 nays.

House Vote 3:

EASING FINANCIAL REGULATION: The House has passed the Promoting Job Creation and Reducing Small Business Burdens Act (H.R. 5405), sponsored by Rep. Michael G. Fitzpatrick, R-Pa. The bill would amend a variety of financial regulation laws, with the intent of easing regulation of small public and private companies and improving their ability to raise capital. Fitzpatrick said the repeal and reform of such regulations would "set businesses and working capital free to invest in the economy and to create jobs" by decreasing their regulatory costs and increasing the amount of money they can invest in business expansion. A bill opponent, Rep. Keith Ellison, D-Minn., said the bill would increase financial risks by diminishing regulatory protections. The vote, on Sept. 16, was 320 yeas to 102 nays.

House Vote 4:

MODIFYING FINANCIAL REFORM LAW: The House has passed a bill (H.R. 5461), sponsored by Rep. Andy Barr, R-Ky., that would change the definitions of points and fees for mortgage transactions included in the Dodd-Frank financial reform law and clarify leverage and risk requirements that Dodd-Frank set out for banks, insurers, and other financial firms. Barr said the bill made simple technical corrections to avoid the unintended consequences of vague language in the Dodd-Frank law, including the adoption of "economically destructive regulations" by financial regulatory agencies. A bill opponent, Rep. Maxine Waters, D-Calif., called it an attempt by Republicans to make substantial and disputed changes to Dodd-Frank under the cover of a bill they claimed made only technical changes. The vote, on Sept. 16, was 327 yeas to 97 nays.

House Vote 5:

AUDITING THE FEDERAL RESERVE: The House has passed the Federal Reserve Transparency Act (H.R. 24), sponsored by Rep. Paul C. Broun, R-Ga. The bill would require the U.S. Comptroller General to complete a full audit of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System and the Federal reserve banks within 12 months. Broun said the audit was needed to "usher in a new era of transparency in this nation's monetary policy" at a time when the Federal Reserve has been granted increased regulatory and financial powers, giving it an unprecedented level of influence over the U.S. economy. A bill opponent, Rep. Elijah E. Cummings, D-Md., said auditing communications among members of the Federal Reserve's Board of Governors and transactions made under the Federal Open Market Committee's direction "would severely curtail the independence" of the Federal Reserve and its ability to conduct deliberations and take actions without fear of interference from Congress and the public. The vote, on Sept. 17, was 333 yeas to 92 nays.

House Vote 6:

CAPPING TSA AIR SECURITY FEES: The House has passed a bill (H.R. 5462), sponsored by Rep. Richard Hudson, R-N.C., that would cap the aviation security fee collected by the Transportation Security Administration at $5.60 per one-way flight and $11.20 per roundtrip flight. Hudson said the cap was needed because the TSA has eliminated its own cap and begun charging airline passengers higher security fees than Congress intended. Hudson said capping the fee would correct the TSA's bid to overreach its authority and charge the excessive fees, and thereby save airline passengers $60 to $70 million annually. The vote, on Sept. 17, was unanimous with 423 yeas.

House Vote 7:

CHESAPEAKE AND OHIO CANAL PARK: The House has passed a bill (S. 476), sponsored by Sen. Benjamin L. Cardin, D-Md., to extend the term of the Chesapeake and Ohio Canal National Historical Park Commission for 10 years. A bill supporter, Rep. Chris Van Hollen, D-Md., said extending the commission's authority would help it advise the National Park Service on how best to manage the C&O Canal park as a tourist and recreational attraction for Maryland and Pennsylvania. The vote, on Sept. 17, was unanimous with 419 yeas.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 8:

ARMING SYRIAN OPPOSITION: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Buck McKeon, R-Calif., to a bill (H.J. Res. 124). The amendment would authorize the Defense Secretary and State Secretary to work to militarily train and equip groups and individuals in Syria that oppose the Islamic State group and the country's government led by Bashar al-Assad. McKeon said the amendment followed President Obama's request for funding to back the Syrian opposition in its fight against Islamic State while strengthening oversight of the funding "by requiring detailed reports, including progress reports on the plan, the vetting process, and the procedures for monitoring the end use of the training and equipment," as well as requiring Obama to inform Congress on how the Syria measures fit within a larger regional strategy for the U.S. in the Middle East. An amendment opponent, Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., said it was "wishful thinking" to arm and train the Free Syrian Army in the belief that it was trustworthy and would not result in arming insurgents who also oppose the U.S., and the U.S. should instead be directly arming the Kurdish military to support its fight against Islamic State. The vote, on Sept. 17, was 273 yeas to 156 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 9:

SHORT-TERM APPROPRIATIONS RESOLUTION: The House has passed a resolution (H.J. Res. 124), sponsored by Rep. Harold Rogers, R-Ky. The resolution would provide continuing appropriations to fund government operations until Dec. 11, 2014, at the rate previously established by legislation to fund the operations in fiscal 2014. It would also extend the operating authority of the Export-Import Bank of the United States through June 2015, fund efforts to contain the Ebola virus outbreak in Africa, extend the Internet Tax Freedom Act through Dec. 11, and give border and immigration enforcement agencies funding flexibility. Rogers said the continued funding avoids the possibility of a government shutdown this fall. A resolution opponent, Rep. Barbara Lee, D-Calif., criticized its across-the-board reduction of funding for the needy, including public health and job training programs, as well as the hasty decision to approve arms and training for Syrian rebels without first having "a thorough and robust debate on the long-term implications of taking such actions." The vote, on Sept. 17, was 319 yeas to 108 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 10:

CHANGING TAX CODE, FINANCIAL REGULATIONS: The House has passed the Jobs for America Act (H.R. 4), sponsored by Rep. Dave Camp, R-Mich. The bill would, among other measures, make permanent bonus depreciation of business expenses, make permanent the corporate research and development tax credit, change the definition of full-time work as used to mandate employers to provide health care insurance to their employees from 30 hours per week to 40 hours per week, and repeal the medical device tax. Camp said restoring the 40-hour work week would stop encouraging employers to cut hours worked by their employees in order to avoid falling under the insurance mandate, boosting wages for the employees, and the bill's other measures would also promote the creation of jobs with higher take-home pay. A bill opponent, Rep. Maxine Waters, D-Calif., criticized the bill's effort to significantly constrain the ability of financial regulatory agencies to adopt rules that prevent firms from engaging in risky trading practices that could create another financial crisis and charging too much for payday loans and mortgage services. The vote, on Sept. 18, was 253 yeas to 163 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 11:

ENERGY REGULATION: The House has passed the American Energy Solutions for Lower Costs and More American Jobs Act (H.R. 2), sponsored by Rep. Lee Terry, R-Neb. The bill would approve construction of the Keystone XL pipeline to carry oil from Alberta into the U.S., streamline regulatory reviews of proposals to export liquefied natural gas, build natural gas pipelines, and engage in energy production on federal lands, as well as block the Obama administration from adopting a stream buffer zone rule to regulate coal mining near streams. Terry said that by reducing burdensome regulation of energy development, the bill would "support resource development and minimize the red tape that strangles our job creators" and makes energy supplies less affordable and less reliable. A bill opponent, Rep. Henry A. Waxman, D-Calif., said it would harm the environment by degrading the ability of federal regulators to advance regulations that limit the environmental consequences of energy development. The vote, on Sept. 18, was 226 yeas to 191 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

SENATE VOTES:

Senate Vote 1:

WAGE DISCRIMINATION BETWEEN MEN AND WOMEN: The Senate has rejected a motion to end debate on the Paycheck Fairness Act (S. 2199), sponsored by Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski, D-Md. The bill would establish various measures to prevent wage discrimination on the basis of sex, including the collection of data on wages paid to women and men and penalties against employers who violate sex discrimination rules and retaliate against sex discrimination whistleblowers. Mikulski said the bill would close legal loopholes that allow for continued pay discrimination, and would introduce measures to make sure "there is no retaliation, no excuses" for employers who do not pay women and men equally. An opponent of ending debate, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, R-Ky., said the bill was bad policy that would increase litigation without benefiting women, and the Senate should instead be working on legislation to reverse the recent trend of falling wages for both women and men. The vote, on Sept. 15, was 52 yeas to 40 nays, with a three-fifths majority required to end debate.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 2:

CONFIRMING NRC COMMISSIONER: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Jeffrey Martin Baran to serve as a commissioner on the Nuclear Regulatory Commission for the remainder of a term ending at the close of June 2015. A supporter, Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., said Baran had more than 10 years of experience in Congress helping oversee the NRC in roles that included his current work as staff director on the House Energy and Commerce Committee. The vote, on Sept. 16, was 56 yeas to 44 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 3:

CONFIRMING SECOND NRC COMMISSIONER: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Stephen G. Burns to serve as a commissioner on the Nuclear Regulatory Commission for a five-year term ending at the close of June 2019. A supporter, Sen. Barbara Boxer, D-Calif., cited Burns' lengthy experience as an NRC legal staffer, including serving as the agency's General Counsel from 2009 to 2012. Boxer said Burns and Jeffery Baran, who was confirmed as an NRC commissioner in another Senate vote, "will help lead the NRC in a way that will increase the level of confidence the American people have in the safety of the nation's nuclear facilities." An opponent, Sen. David Vitter, R-La., questioned whether Burns would be an adequate contributor to the NRC due to his lack of qualifications. The vote, on Sept. 16, was 60 yeas to 40 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 4:

CONFIRMING AMBASSADOR TO TURKEY: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of John R. Bass to serve as U.S. ambassador to Turkey. Bass, a career member of the State Department's Foreign Service, had served as ambassador to Georgia from 2009 to 2012, as State Department Executive Secretary since 2012, and in a variety of posts at diplomatic offices in Europe and Africa over the past several decades. There was no floor debate on the nomination. The vote, on Sept. 17, was unanimous with 98 yeas.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 5:

APPROVING SHORT-TERM APPROPRIATIONS RESOLUTION: The Senate has passed a resolution (H.J. Res. 124), sponsored by Rep. Harold Rogers, R-Ky. The resolution would provide continuing appropriations to fund government operations until Dec. 11, 2014, at the rate previously established by legislation to fund the operations in fiscal 2014. It would also extend the operating authority of the Export-Import Bank of the United States through June 2015, fund efforts to contain the Ebola virus outbreak in Africa, extend the Internet Tax Freedom Act through Dec. 11, and give border and immigration enforcement agencies funding flexibility. A supporter, Sen. Barbara A. Mikulski, D-Md., said that along with avoiding a government shutdown this fall, the resolution addressed the need to combat Russian interference in Ukraine, Islamic militants in the Middle East, and the Ebola outbreak. A resolution opponent, Sen. Rand Paul, R-Ky., said its approval of funding to arm "feckless rebels in Syria" would open the door to those weapons winding up in the hands of the Islamic State group following reversals on the battlefield, with the result of increasing violence and instability in the Middle East and increasing terrorism risks. The vote, on Sept. 18, was 78 yeas to 22 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

LUJAN STATEMENT ON AMENDMENT AUTHORIZING TRAINING AND EQUIPPING OF REBEL GROUPS IN SYRIA; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 393 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after voting against an amendment to a Continuing Resolution that authorized the training and equipping of rebel groups in Syria. Lujan voted for the Continuing Resolution that is needed to prevent the government from shutting down at the end of September.

"ISIL poses a threat to the Middle East and has the potential to threaten our homeland if it is not addressed. I support efforts to use targeted airstrikes and intelligence to help degrade ISIL's ability to gain the money and weapons that enhance their destructive capabilities. However, I have serious concerns with the current plan to equip and train Syrian rebels. Countries in the Middle East must take a leading role against this threat in their own region. Our allies in the region must prove that they are willing to stand up and commit the resources necessary to complement the United States. A major focus must be ending the flow of money and the recruitment of fighters that are supporting ISIL. Until our allies fully commit to this effort, I have concerns that remain with the current plan. To date it is not clear our allies have fully committed to this plan and ending the flow of money to ISIL.

"While the amendment calls for the vetting and reporting on every person recruited for training, it does not prevent individuals with ties to extremist or terrorist groups from participating. I am also concerned that the conflict in the region has the potential to escalate and further entangle our country in a civil war in Syria. While the purpose of training Syrians is to combat ISIL, and not the Assad regime, if Assad's forces target the rebels, we will be faced with the prospect of engaging the regime and escalating this conflict. In addition, the Syrians may end up turning their focus to overthrowing the Assad regime instead of concentrating on ISIL.

"While I opposed the amendment, I voted on the underlying bill - the Continuing Resolution - that prevents another government shutdown. The process should have included separate votes and debate on the training of Syrian rebels and the Continuing Resolution."

NM labs bypass DOE on tech transfer;
Sandia, LANL broaden aggressive commercialization efforts as Energy Dept. drags its heels

BYLINE: COPYRIGHT © 2014 ALBUQUERQUE JOURNAL BY KEVIN ROBINSON-AVILA JOURNAL STAFF WRITER

SECTION: BUSINESS OUTLOOK; Pg. 6

LENGTH: 1388 words

Sandia National Laboratories is turning to the New Mexico Angels to help take its technology-transfer efforts to the next level.

The Angels, a group of local investors who pool their resources to build startup companies, will host lab scientists and tech-transfer administrators in a first-ever technology showcase luncheon this month to allow the group's members to kick the tires on some new, cutting-edge Sandia inventions.

The event reflects a growing effort by Sandia to reach into the heart of New Mexico's business and investment community to move lab-developed innovation into the marketplace.

Sandia has organized open community events in the past to introduce the public to potentially marketable Sandia technologies. But the Sept. 25 luncheon aims to construct direct bridges with local movers and shakers in New Mexico's startup community, said Peter Atherton, senior manager of industry partnerships at the lab.

"Our previous events attracted many participants and generated a lot of energy and buzz," Atherton said. "But now we're partnering directly with the Angels to help move our intellectual property to market. They represent a broad group of very active investors who have lots of connections, energy and experience in forming and growing companies around technology."

Aggressive efforts

The new partnership with the Angels is the latest in a series of aggressive efforts by both Sandia and Los Alamos National Laboratory to draw private investors and entrepreneurs directly into the process of commercializing lab technology. Thanks to those efforts, both institutions are achieving new milestones in their tech-transfer programs.

Their efforts reflect initiative and willingness among local laboratory leaders to embrace technology commercialization, say veteran investors and tech-transfer professionals in New Mexico. And that, in turn, is placing them ahead of federal initiatives, which remain deficient despite congressional mandates that require the U.S. Department of Energy to push technology commercialization.

"We're seeing things at the lab level move a lot faster than at the federal level," said John Freisinger, president and CEO of Technology Ventures Corp. in Albuquerque, which supports commercialization at Sandia and other laboratories. "I think the labs are getting a little more bold to do things on their own given the lack of leadership from Washington, D.C."

That lack of leadership is a problem, because public and private sector partnerships that draw on advances at the labs are considered critical to improving the competitiveness of American industry in the global economy. Federally funded research, for example, has provided the launching pad for groundbreaking innovation in medicine, energy and computers.

DOE lack of effort

But the DOE has shown a chronic lack of initiative since Congress passed the Energy Policy Act of 2005, according to a report that the DOE Inspector General's office released last February.

The act requires the DOE to appoint a technology-transfer coordinator to oversee commercialization efforts nationwide, develop a comprehensive strategy, and set up a technology-commercialization fund with 0.9 percent of the DOE's annual budget.

But since 2005, only one tech-transfer coordinator has ever served in the post for just two years, until early 2013, and the DOE has never developed a strategy nor set up the required fund.

The DOE does have an "acting coordinator" now drawing up policy recommendations for Energy Secretary Ernest Moniz, who took office last year, but there's been no new federal initiatives.

"From the federal perspective, there hasn't been much change from when the previous tech-transfer coordinator left the DOE in 2013," Freisinger said. "The secretary seems to be in listening mode right now."

Tom Brennan of Arch Venture Partners, a veteran of technology transfer at the laboratories, said he's seen no change at the federal level.

"I only see small initiatives that are in no way focused or big enough to make any real impact," Brennan said.

NM lawmaker doubts

New Mexico legislators say Moniz does appear committed to developing a commercialization plan and addressing deficiencies, but the pace of those efforts is slow.

"I'm disturbed by the things outlined in the Inspector General's report," said Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M. "Those things have been around since before Moniz took office, but we're still lagging on clearing the problems up."

In fact, during a roundtable discussion with New Mexico's top technology-transfer professionals in Albuquerque last month, Moniz said the DOE does want to "raise the game" in technology commercialization, but he stressed that it's a secondary goal at the national labs.

"I want to make it very clear, technology transfer is not our primary mission," Moniz said.

Both Luján and Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., have introduced legislation in their respective chambers to accelerate commercialization.

Luján's bill would provide federal funds to pay for the government's share of Cooperative Research and Development Agreements, which give private companies access to lab equipment, infrastructure and scientific expertise to develop and commercialize new technologies.

Udall's bill would create joint public- and private-sector DOE teams to devise and execute strategies, while authorizing the Small Business Administration to broaden existing programs to provide funding and low-cost loans to companies that commercialize lab technology.

But those bills have yet to move in Congress. And in the meantime, that leaves most of the initiative up to the labs themselves.

In New Mexico, the laboratories are stepping up to the plate.

LANL created a new institute last year, the Richard Feynman Center for Innovation, to centralize all tech-transfer programs and administration under one roof, and to integrate those efforts more directly into the lab's core research mission, said center Director David Pesiri.

More important, the center now draws on lab partnerships with private companies to involve investors at the earliest stages in technology development and market strategies.

Enlisting private partners

"We're not now pursuing technology transfer as something separate from what the lab does, but rather bringing it into the lab mission itself," Pesiri said. "We're bringing private partners deeper into the core of how LANL conducts its business."

That's led to some major achievements recently. In early September, for example, the lab signed a major licensing agreement with Whitewood Encryption Systems Inc. in Boston to jointly develop and market advanced data encryption technology created by LANL.

The lab also is providing funding for small companies in northern and central New Mexico to help businesses develop new technologies and services. To date, the lab's "venture acceleration fund" has provided about $3 million to some 40 companies. That includes $30,000 granted in 2013 to Titan Aerospace, a Moriarty firm with a new, solar-powered drone that was acquired early this year by Google.

Sandia, meanwhile, is pursuing a "life cycle" strategy of commercialization that has scientists considering the market potential of new technologies from the earliest stages of research. That's led to a huge increase in patent activity at the lab, with record levels this year of invention disclosures by scientists, patent applications and patents issued, Atherton said.

Sandia also has streamlined its licensing process to cut red tape and overhauled its website and marketing materials to make its technologies more accessible to investors. And now, its reaching out much more aggressively to serial entrepreneurs like the Angels to build the partnerships needed to commercialize innovation.

"We're bringing our inventors directly together with experienced businesspeople," Atherton said. "We want to be part of the emerging energy we see in entrepreneurial innovation and startup activity happening in Albuquerque." The new Sandia-Angel partnership already has generated one success story, with Angels funding a new company, Sandstone Diagnostics, to market Sandia technology to provide over-the-counter fertility tests for males.

"Sandia has some very interesting technologies that we want to look at," said Angels President John Chavez. "After this first event, we expect to do a lot more showcases with them."

Congressional challengers question airstrike strategy; Weh worried about militants in U.S.

BYLINE: JAMES MONTELEONE JOURNAL STAFF WRITER

LENGTH: 581 words

Two of New Mexico's congressional challengers are voicing opposition to President Barack Obama's strategy to target Islamic State fighters in Iraq and Syria using airstrikes rather than American "boots on the ground."

And the challengers' views are in contrast with the general approval for the Obama strategy from New Mexico's congressional incumbents.

Republican congressional challengers Jeff Byrd and Mike Frese said Thursday that destroying the Islamic State organization will likely require intervention from American ground forces.

The group is commonly referenced by different names, including the Islamic State of Iraq and Syria (ISIS) and the Islamic State of Iraq and the Levant (ISIL), based on different translations of the group's Arabic name.

"I like that he (Obama) is coming out wanting to eliminate them as a threat," said Byrd, who is challenging Democratic Rep. Ben Ray Luján for New Mexico's 3rd Congressional District seat in the U.S. House. "I am concerned about the ability to actually achieve that goal without more than just airstrikes."

Frese, who is challenging Democrat Michelle Lujan Grisham for the 1st Congressional District seat, said he's hopeful but "not impressed" by the approach the president outlined in a speech Wednesday night.

"We have to stop them there, because they'll come here," Frese said of the Islamic State. "I don't doubt it. And I don't think this president's timid steps are going to get it done."

Representatives Luján and Lujan Grisham voiced tentative support for Obama's strategy.

"I believe that Congress and the president must work together to ensure the strategy has clear goals, a clear exit, is precise, and does not commit U.S. combat troops on the ground," Luján said.

Lujan Grisham said she would like to see the fight against the Islamic State be collaborative with U.S. allies.

"I support efforts to supplement our military might with a broad coalition of international partners to ensure we are not fighting this threat alone," Lujan Grisham said.

Republican U.S. Senate candidate Allen Weh struck a different tone than the House challengers. Weh, a 38-year Marine Corps veteran, has said he could not judge the appropriate use of military force without access to the military briefings provided to members of Congress.

But Weh on Thursday cited concerns about U.S. borders offering easy access for Islamic State fighters seeking to enter the country.

"That's not a comprehensive strategy," Weh said, referring to the president's speech, "and it certainly isn't leadership when it's needed."

"If elected to the Senate, I will fight to seal the border and do everything I can to protect our families," he said.

Democratic Sen. Tom Udall said he supports use of targeted airstrikes against the Islamic State but warned against any effort that would require ground forces.

"I have serious concerns about the call to war that I hear from some of my colleagues. We cannot afford to rush to war again," Udall said.

Republican Rep. Steve Pearce said that he appreciated the president's response to the Islamic State threat and hopes Obama's strategy will be successful.

Democrat Roxanne "Rocky" Lara, who is challenging Pearce for the 2nd Congressional District seat, voiced similar support for Obama's strategy but joined Udall in warning against deployment of ground forces.

"I remain opposed to sending American ground troops to the Middle East," Lara said. "We must build an international coalition and empower allies in region to uproot ISIS."

LUJAN STATEMENT ON THE ANNIVERSARY OF 9/11 TERRORIST ATTACKS;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 225 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on the anniversary of the terrorist attacks on September 11, 2001.

"Today we remember those who lost their lives during the terrorist attack on our nation thirteen years ago. While we continue to mourn this tragedy, we also reflect on our country's ability to stand strong and endure in the face of such heinous acts.

"We remember the first responders who exemplified bravery and risked their lives to help those in need, as well as citizens who found the courage to act and help their fellow neighbor. Yesterday, Congress honored those that perished with the Congressional Gold Medal, the highest civilian award that can be bestowed. We also honor and show our gratitude to those who were called to join the Armed Services, especially those who continue to serve and sacrifice in order to protect our country. The heroism and valor of these individuals truly represent the best our country has to offer.

"We are not defined by tragedy, but rather by the strength and resolve that we show in response. On the anniversary of 9/11, let us remain united in spirit and continue to honor the memory of those we lost."

Pueblo's easement battle raises tensions in El Rancho

BYLINE: Staci Matlock, The Santa Fe New Mexican

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 1926 words

Sept. 07--As a teenager in the early 1980s, Janet Hererra drove the county roads around her hometown of El Rancho, a small community stretched along both sides of the Pojoaque River north of Santa Fe. Now she drives the same Santa Fe County roads to reach N.M. 502 and her job at Los Alamos National Laboratory.

At least she thought they were county roads. That's how they were labeled on maps. Everyone knew the county maintained them.

But Herrera and her neighbors found out a few months ago that San Ildefonso Pueblo believes County Road 84 and several spur roads belong to the pueblo. The pueblo has told the county and two El Rancho residents to negotiate easements or face trespassing fines.

Questions about rights of way cloud the titles to El Rancho properties and are making it hard for some people to sell their homes. Some residents fear the pueblo could prevent them from accessing their homes.

This isn't the only issue rattling the community of about 1,000 people. A settlement in the long-running Aamodt water-rights suit that will impact water delivery and new easements for utility lines crossing pueblo lands eventually will hit El Rancho residents in their pocketbooks.

"People are upset," said Herrera, 50. "People are wondering how did we get here and where will it end?"

San Ildefonso Pueblo Gov. Terry Aguilar, who is an attorney, said he is simply following the law when it comes to rights of way. "We're not going to be taken advantage of anymore," Aguilar said.

The issue has created a rift between pueblo and El Rancho residents, who have lived side by side for generations.

The situation isn't unique. Around New Mexico and across the West, tribes and communities are renegotiating leases that affect everything from oil pipelines to state highways.

Longtime neighbors

The Spanish came to the Pojoaque Valley and San Ildefonso Pueblo in the 1600s. Pueblo people had been there for a few centuries already. They were joined by an influx of Anglos in the 1940s as Los Alamos grew up around the Manhattan Project.

"We farmed together. We traded together. We attended baptisms," said San Ildefonso Tribal Councilor Tim Martinez. "We helped each other at harvest. We played ball together."

Herrera said Gov. Aguilar's aunt used to come over to her grandmother Maria Duran's house with big pans of biscochitos and other food. The two women worked on crafts together. Herrera said when her grandfather Tony "AC" Duran was still an infant, his mother died and he was nursed by a San Ildefonso Pueblo potter.

Herrera and her husband attend Mass at the San Ildefonso church every Sunday.

But things have changed in the last year as the pueblo has asserted its right to renegotiate easements and questioned road boundaries.

"It is really sad what is happening now," said Herrera during a recent lunch break in Los Alamos. "The tensions are high. Between the Jemez Mountains Electric Cooperative easements and rate increase, and now the roads and next the regional water system -- it doesn't feel so friendly anymore."

Martinez, speaking recently at Tesuque Village Market, said, "We don't want to see communities separate in the valley."

But he said the pueblo has been dealing with trespassers for a long time, and now is the time to finally get it under control. "What would you do if people were trespassing on your land?" he asked.

History of disputes

As it turns out, history is simply repeating itself in the dispute over land, roads and rights between San Ildefonso Pueblo and El Rancho. A Spanish governor in 1701 made land grants to Spanish families in the area that became El Rancho, land San Ildefonso Pueblo still considered its own, according to Spanish Archives of New Mexico and scholars. El Rancho is completely surrounded by pueblo land.

Disputes over the land continued through the 18th century.

By 1868, land patents held by San Ildefonso and other pueblos had been recognized by each conquering government -- Spain, Mexico and the United States. More legal wrangling followed, though, as the U.S. Supreme Court made pendulum swings in how it viewed Native Americans and land rights.

At different times, the pueblo government sold off parcels of land.

To stop all the disputes, Congress passed the 1924 Pueblo Lands Act and told everyone in the valley -- pueblo and non-pueblo -- to prove their claims. It seemed the whole dispute over lands and boundaries was settled.

But as communities grew, electric lines were put in, roads were built and natural gas pipelines were installed. Disputes over rights of way across pueblo lands increased.

In 1967, the pueblo refused an easement deal with the New Mexico Highway Commission to extend N.M. 30 between Española and the road to Los Alamos. The state threatened to condemn the 3.6-mile section across San Ildefonso Pueblo land because the pueblo wouldn't agree to the offered price.

In 1976, San Ildefonso Pueblo named trespassing by non-pueblo people as one of its main concerns. Over the years, pueblo officials said, fences had been cut, woodcutters had hauled off firewood, trash had piled up and off-road trails had appeared on pueblo land. It's not that people meant harm, said James Martinez, the pueblo governor at the time. "They're just individuals who don't pay attention to signs."

In the late 1990s, when Terry Aguilar became governor of San Ildefonso, the pueblo again disputed Santa Fe County's jurisdiction over County Road 84-C. The pueblo was furious when the county's maintenance trucks came through the pueblo during religious ceremonies. The county apologized but said it was responsible for maintaining the road.

Pueblo officials in 1999 also threatened to shut down a portion of N.M. 4 that crosses pueblo land after negotiations to renew a 50-year-old lease failed. But the road wasn't closed and the two sides eventually worked out a deal.

Rising tensions

Still, people in El Rancho and San Ildefonso say they don't remember anything like the tension that's arisen in the last year. "I don't know all the players. I don't know all the issues," said Stella Shelburnfrom her home in El Rancho. "I just know people are hurting."

The community's residents already were angry over new rights-of-way agreements between Jemez Mountains Electric Cooperative and five pueblos that would raise their electricity rates by up to 30 percent over the next few years. The way the rate cases were handled made them feel abandoned by the state Public Regulation Commission, the cooperative and their elected officials.

Then they found out San Ildefonso Pueblo was threatening Santa Fe County with trespass on County Road 84, 84-C and other spurs. Until N.M. 502 was built, County Road 84 was the main road between Pojoaque and El Rancho. Santa Fe County inked an easement agreement with the pueblo in 1989, and El Rancho residents had thought the easement was permanent. The pueblo says it isn't.

El Rancho residents have formed a couple of groups to get information out to the community.

"I guess you could say we are feeling a bit not represented by our elected officials," said Heather Nordquist, Shelburn's daughter, who is the fifth generation on her mother's side to grow up in El Rancho. "We don't have anything against the pueblo, but if the feds and the county are working with them and giving them money, then who is working for us?"

"We want the pueblo to succeed, but we don't feel everyone else has to fail for the pueblo to succeed."

Official salvos in the county road trespass battle have fired back and forth between officials since December, when Raymond Fry, superintendent of the Northern Pueblos Agency of the U.S. Bureau of Indian Affairs, sent a letter to Santa Fe County saying it lacked an easement to use County Roads 84, 84A to 84D and Sandy Way across San Ildefonso Pueblo land. The county was given 30 days to negotiate a rights-of-way easement with the pueblo for the roads or face trespass fines and eviction.

Two El Rancho residents who live on private land accessed by those roads received the same letter telling them they were trespassing.

County Manager Katherine Miller and then county attorney Stephen Ross fired an angry letter back to the BIA, saying the agency had failed to properly research the road easement and asking Fry to immediately withdraw his letter. The county called the BIA's allegation of trespass "a serious overreaching" and "far from a constructive way to renew the debate about county lands and access to non-Indian property within the Pueblos."

New Mexico Congressman Ben Ray Luján sent a letter to Kevin Washburn, assistant secretary of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, saying the agency's letters "have begun to unravel the fabric of the local community. Community members are in fear of losing access to their homes and businesses."

The BIA responded in April, noting the agency and San Ildefonso Pueblo don't agree that the 1989 right-of-way agreement covers all the county roads in question.

"BIA doesn't get involved unless they are 100 percent sure they are right," Gov. Aguilar said.

Tensions surrounding County Road 84 boiled over at a community meeting last month, when private property owners in the community of El Rancho accused Aguilar of taking away their rights, according to people who were there.

Congressman Luján, a Pojoaque Valley native, attended the meeting. "I am concerned with the emotional tone in the community," Luján said later via email. "At the public meeting the situation regarding Ferguson, Missouri was brought up. Given what has happened in other parts of the country, I am fearful of what could fall apart in our community."

"It is important that as we deal with these issues we do not lose sight of the fact that we are one big community that must find a way to work together to find peaceful solutions."

Aguilar said his intention is to show where the county roads cross pueblo land and to ensure everyone who has a driveway connecting to the county roads across pueblo lands has legal access. "Let's determine if this is Indian land or non-Indian land," he said.

The pueblo is working with the county to survey the roads and adjacent lands in El Rancho now. They will hold another community meeting to discuss the results.

Revenue opportunities

San Ildefonso Pueblo has no casino like its neighbors in Pojoaque, Santa Clara and Tesuque. Aguilar is clear his intention is to make sure the pueblo is fairly paid by companies to run water lines, gas lines, electricity and fiber optics across pueblo land.

Aguilar said that ultimately, settling road access issues will help El Rancho residents. "Right now, with unresolved access issues, property values can be impacted and affect their ability to sell property," he said in an email.

"It's always like this when Native Americans become very aggressive, become educated, study and decide to make things better for themselves," Martinez said. "People come out of the woodwork and say, 'You can't do this to us.' "

Nordquist said the problem is that people in El Rancho don't understand the pueblo's endgame. "We're all just sitting back and thinking, what are they going to do? Are they going to lock us out of their property? Are they planning to charge us so much for utility easements that we can't afford the bills?

"Maybe if we understood it better, there wouldn't be so much controversy," she said.

5 things to know about New Mexico's elections

SECTION: POLITICAL NEWS; STATE AND REGIONAL

LENGTH: 551 words

DATELINE: ALBUQUERQUE, N.M.

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) - New Mexico voters will be choosing a lot more than a governor this November. They will also be electing a new attorney general and deciding whether Democrats will retain control of the state U.S. Senate seats and the statehouse. Here are five things to know about the midterm elections:

- U.S. SENATE

Democratic U.S. Sen. Tom Udall is seeking his second term, and with a sizeable campaign fund, he's favored for an easy re-election. But Republican Allen Weh is putting up some of his personal fortune to launch an aggressive challenge. Udall is a popular former attorney general and congressman. Weh, a longtime Albuquerque businessman, is a former state Republican Party chairman and a retired Marine colonel who came in second behind Gov. Susana Martinez in the governor's primary four years ago.

- ATTORNEY GENERAL

State auditor Hector Balderas, considered a rising star in the state Democratic Party, holds a more than 20-to-1 campaign cash advantage over Republican Susan Riedel in the race for attorney general. Balderas has stockpiled more money than any other statewide office candidates, except for Republican Gov. Susana Martinez. Balderas and Riedel are seeking the post being vacated by Gary King, who is attempting to unseat Martinez. Riedel is a former prosecutor and judge from Las Cruces.

- U.S. HOUSE

All three incumbents for New Mexico's congressional seats are running for re-election. In the 1st Congressional District that covers most of Albuquerque, Democrat Michelle Lujan Grisham is being challenged in her bid for a second term by Republican Mike Frese, a 66-year-old scientist and small business owner from Corrales. For the 2nd Congressional District seat, Democratic three-term incumbent Rep. Ben Ray Lujan is being challenged for a second time by Republican Jefferson Byrd of Tucumcari. In southern New Mexico, the national Democratic Congressional Committee is working to help Carlsbad lawyer Democratic attorney Roxanne "Rocky" Laura in her bid to unseat 3rd District Rep. Steve Pearce, who held the seat from 2003 to 2009, and most recently since 2011.

- LEGISLATURE

All 70 House seats are up for election this year. Twenty-five incumbents are unopposed. Republicans are eyeing the November election in hopes they can pick up enough seats to take control of the House for the first time in 60 years. Democrats hold a 37-33 advantage in the House. Democrats have a 25-17 majority in the Senate, and senators don't run for election until 2016. Republicans hope their House candidates will receive a boost this fall by having the governor on the ballot to increase turnout of GOP-leaning voters in several potentially tight races.

- SECRETARY OF STATE

One of the feistier races is that between Republican Secretary of State Dianna Duran and Democratic Bernalillo County Clerk Maggie Toulouse Oliver. They gave a preview on primary night with a squabble over how test returns ended up on a state website. Duran's office blamed the county, saying some 88,000 Democratic votes that were part of test files were mistakenly reported by the clerk's office. County Clerk Maggie Toulouse Oliver said technicians verified the county sent only one file to state election officials Tuesday and that file included the correct results that the county posted on its own website.

Congress reconsiders militarized police

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN Journal Washington Bureau

SECTION: EDITORIALS; Pg. B2

LENGTH: 786 words

On a late night in June, the U.S. House of Representatives was debating a routine military spending bill when Rep. Alan Grayson offered an unusual amendment.

The Florida Democrat asked his colleagues to end a federal program that allows the U.S. military to transfer - free of charge - its high-powered weaponry and other war fighting equipment to local police.

Calling it "a growing problem throughout our country" Grayson lamented police militarization resulting from the Pentagon's 1033 program, which enables departments to acquire armored vehicles, bombs, grenade launchers, gun silencers, camouflage uniforms, helicopters, drones and more for use in policing.

"I think this is appalling," Grayson said. "Those weapons have no place in our streets regardless of who may be deploying them. I don't think this is the way I want my America to be. I think our police should act like public servants, not warriors at war."

Grayson's House colleagues quickly trounced his amendment on a 355-62 vote with New Mexico Reps. Steve Pearce, a Republican, and Ben Ray Lujan, a Democrat, voting against it. Democratic Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham was in Albuquerque attending a funeral and missed the vote, her spokesman said.

Opponents of the amendment argued that cash-strapped police departments need the gear and don't abuse it.

Fast forward two months to Ferguson, Mo. Suddenly members of Congress - including some from New Mexico - are changing their tune.

Ferguson police, armed with some of the military-style gear Grayson described, have clashed with protestors repeatedly since the cops' controversial Aug. 9 shooting of an unarmed man named Michael Brown.

Televised images of police-warriors confronting protestors with tear gas and rubber bullets has sparked a national debate not only about tactics, but the intimidating paramilitary equipment now commonplace in police departments across the country.

Sen. Claire McCaskill, D-Mo., has already called for a hearing to look into the 1033 program when Congress reconvenes in September.

My three-part Journal series on "mission creep" at the U.S. Department of Homeland Security, published in April, described how DHS and the Pentagon funnel millions of dollars in grants and war fighting equipment to New Mexico law enforcement agencies. Neither the federal government nor the state could account for how millions had been spent on such equipment in New Mexico.

Pearce, alarmed by the Bureau of Land Management's "militarized attitude" in its standoff with Nevada Rancher Cliven Bundy this summer, said he would rethink his vote against Grayson's amendment. He voiced worry not only about militarized local cops, but the proliferation of federal police agencies such as the BLM's.

"I'm extremely concerned with the militarization of the police," Pearce told me in a phone interview. "I think it is sending exactly the wrong signal. People have to stand in the streets and object to a government that is so strong. If the vote were had today - even it had Alan Grayson's hooks in it - I might vote for it."

Lujan Grisham wondered if the paramilitary gear creates community mistrust.

"Without proper oversight and accountability, I am concerned that local law enforcement's unrestricted access to military-grade weapons and vehicles will contribute to mutual distrust between officers and the public that they have the responsibility to protect," she said. "Congress should not only establish additional safeguards against police militarization, but ensure that local law enforcement agencies have the proper equipment and training to protect themselves and the public that they serve."

Sen. Tom Udall, a Democrat and former New Mexico attorney general, said police officers should have "every tool they need ... but it must come with accountability and respect for civil liberties."

"It's appropriate for us in Congress and for leaders at every level of government to examine whether policies like the 1033 program are incentivizing an antagonistic or militaristic relationship between civilians and police," he said.

Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., agreed: "This situation has made it clear that a review of the policies and programs that have allowed the events of Ferguson to transpire - including the transfer of military equipment to police forces - is needed."

Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., said while the Senate has had no proposals to limit military transfers, he suggested he is open to it.

"I have real concerns that Congress has failed to properly scrutinize this program after authorizing it and would question whether the transfer of some equipment has been proportionate to local needs and the expectations of ordinary, law-abiding citizens," he said.

Feds' plan to make more nuke triggers at LANL raises questions

BYLINE: Patrick Malone, The Santa Fe New Mexican

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 1492 words

Aug. 24--Los Alamos National Laboratory, birthplace of the atomic bomb, could ramp up production of triggers for nuclear weapons to levels not seen since the Cold War, if federal defense and energy officials get their way.

The federal government sees the site atop a rugged canyon cliff overlooking the vast expanse of plateaus and distant hills in Northern New Mexico as the perfect place -- really, the only one -- for an ambitious mission to massively increase production of plutonium pits -- the softball-sized cores that can have the explosive power of the Nagasaki bomb. The pits are used to set off thermonuclear reactions in weapons tens of thousands of times more powerful than the pits themselves. The new pits would not be used for new weapons, proponents of the plan say, but to replace aging pits in the nation's nuclear stockpile.

But questions abound over the proposal. Foremost among them: Are more pits needed? Thousands of pits already are warehoused at a storage facility in Texas that scientists say could be used to supply the needs of the nation's nuclear industry for many decades.

There are also questions about the costs of increased production, whether Los Alamos has the space to increase production and whether the lab has the ability to safely house the dangerous and delicate war-grade plutonium required to produce the weapon components. The lab facility designated for pit production at Los Alamos is considered too small for the levels of production officials propose, and it sits over a seismic fault.

In a report to lawmakers this month, the Congressional Research Service describes a national defense agenda to produce 30 war reserve plutonium pits per year by 2026, and up to 80 pits per year by 2030.

To put the magnitude of the strategy in perspective, the U.S. has produced a total of 30 pits -- all at Los Alamos -- between 2007 and the present. Before that, domestic pit production had been at a standstill since 1989, when federal agents stormed the Rocky Flats Plant in Colorado to investigate environmental crimes and the facility was shuttered. Rocky Flats had produced up to 2,000 pits annually during the Cold War.

One nuclear watchdog familiar with the idea said the mission at Los Alamos carries the further risk of eroding the trust of countries that, along with the United States, have committed to drawing down their nuclear stockpiles.

"There's a financial cost. There's an environmental cost. There's a cost to our identity as a country, and there's a cost to our international credibility in nonproliferation," said Greg Mello, executive director of the Los Alamos Study Group.

In the years following the closure of Rocky Flats, a combination of the shutdown and international treaties prohibiting the production of new nuclear weapons halted production of plutonium pits in the U.S. for nearly two decades. Production resumed in 2007, but only at Los Alamos, which produced 11 that year. The lab has never produced more than six in any year since then.

But the same nonproliferation treaties that halted the production of new weapons also prohibited the testing of existing stockpiles. Those provisions have created uncertainty about the reliability of the aging bombs.

One popular analogy among frustrated factions in national defense circles likens the stockpile to a rusty old car in a driveway. It might unexpectedly need to be driven someday, but turning the key to test whether it will start is strictly forbidden.

The U.S. Department of Defense, some in Congress and the National Nuclear Safety Administration -- an arm of the Department of Energy that manages the country's nuclear weapons program -- want to replace aging triggers with new ones to ensure the weapons will work if they're ever needed.

A debate has raged for years between nuclear hawks and nonproliferation advocates about whether the pits need updating. Mello and other skeptics point to a 2006 report from the JASON Defense Advisory Panel, an independent scientific group, that said the useful life of a plutonium pit is up to 100 years. That would give many of the existing pits another half-century before they would need to be replaced.

For subscribers to that theory, the roughly 15,000 plutonium pits manufactured at Rocky Flats and stored at the Pantex Plant in Amarillo, Texas, are already more than enough.

But proponents of increased production, including some members of Congress, say it is critical to have an arsenal they know will work. And having new pits would provide that confidence.

"Modernization of infrastructure and a robust plutonium science and technology program are key to our ability to respond to emerging issues and threats, to ensure safety of our facilities and personnel, and to assure the safety, security and effectiveness of the U.S. nuclear deterrent," said Kevin Roark, a spokesman for the lab, which supports the plan.

The Republican-controlled U.S. House of Representatives believed enough in the stepped-up pit production plan that it included it in the defense authorization bill adopted for fiscal year 2015.

The Congressional Research Service report makes it clear that Los Alamos is the front-runner -- if not the sole candidate -- to house those activities. It describes Plutonium Facility 4, or PF-4, at Los Alamos as "the only building in the United States with the combination of attributes required to make pits."

But the building, constructed in 1978 over a seismically active fault, would need expensive modifications to make it big enough and safe enough for increased production, the report said.

In comments at the National Republican Club of Capitol Hill in Washington last year, Jack Mansfield, a member of the federal Defense Nuclear Facility Safety Board, called the building "brittle" and not sufficiently constructed to survive a serious earthquake.

"There is a probability, albeit small, that the building could collapse with great loss of life within and with dispersal of plutonium," he said.

Another building at the lab also would have to be retrofitted to safely store between 400 and 1,760 grams of plutonium for increased production, the report says. The building is currently designed to hold 26 grams.

The congressional report makes no recommendations about how the nuclear defense complex should proceed with the strategy to increase pit production and doesn't speculate at the cost. Rather, it poses questions for Congress to consider about the steps and associated costs necessary to execute the plan.

"With NNSA, Los Alamos National Laboratory is exploring a wide spectrum of options to fulfill our mission commitments to plutonium manufacturing," LANL spokesman Roark said. "While using existing facilities both at Los Alamos and across the complex is a short-term solution, it is not sustainable for the long haul."

Mello questions the report's conclusion that Los Alamos is the best place to do the work. But he thinks the report makes clear that the decision already has been made.

"Nobody should doubt that this is a high-hazard industrial operation," he said. "The bigger it is, the more complicated it is, the more likely it is that there will be accidents."

Mello worries the shifting international landscape of nuclear posturing -- Iran's capability to produce weapons and unknowns about Russia's intentions in Ukraine -- will be leveraged to convince some members of Congress to support the plan.

And he expects little resistance from New Mexico's members of Congress, who have been largely mum on the plan.

"The citizens of Santa Fe have to wake up and realize that the identity of their metro area is tied up in this," he said. "It would only take one disaster to end community development."

Of the state's five-member congressional delegation, only the offices of U.S. Sen. Tom Udall and U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, both Democrats, answered The New Mexican's questions about the plan.

Jennifer Talhelm, a spokeswoman for Udall, said the senator supports reducing the number of nuclear weapons around the globe, but also supports replacing weapon components to ensure the safety, security and reliability of the U.S. stockpile.

"Los Alamos is the only lab capable of this work," she said.

Luján said he also embraces nonproliferation, but he believes the existing stockpile should be well maintained, and that Los Alamos should play a big role in that.

But he did not commit to a firm position on the plan described in the report and said Congress should proceed cautiously.

"While this report discusses many of the factors that go into pit production, there are a number of questions that remain," Luján said, "along with the need for significant discussion and research to determine the best path forward."

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

The U.S. Commerce Department's Economic Development Administration (EDA) today announced a $75,000 grant to the North Central New Mexico Economic Development District (NCNMEDD) of Santa Fe, New Mexico, to provide critical technical assistance to Taos County that will help them address the economic impacts of the Chevron Molybdenum mine closure and the resultant job loss.

"The Obama administration is committed to helping communities impacted by major economic challenges develop and implement their plans to diversify, grow, and provide the critical skills that displaced workers need to compete," said U.S. Deputy Assistant Secretary of Commerce for Economic Development Jay Williams. "The EDA grant announced today will help Taos County and the Village of Questa capitalize on the opportunities available for assistance to address the mine closure."

"The closure of the mine in Questa is devastating to the workers, their families and the region, and I'm dedicated to helping the community rebuild the economy. I'm pleased that the Economic Development Administration has acted quickly to provide Taos County with funding for critical help to maximize available federal resources and address the economic impacts of the Chevron mine closure," said U.S. Senator Tom Udall (NM). "The EDA grant will help the Village of Questa as it develops a long-term plan to grow the economy and will provide training opportunities to help workers find new jobs."

"In this difficult time for the Questa community, the mine workers, and all those impacted by the closure of the Chevron mine, these funds will assist with important efforts to create new opportunities for these hard-working men and women," said U.S. Representative Ben Ray Luján. "A workforce training program is a key component that will help workers get the skills and training they need to find a good job."

In August, 2014, 300 miners employed at the Chevron-owned Questa mine were laid off when the mine permanently closed. The EDA investments will provide technical assistance to Taos County to address the economic impacts of the Chevron Molybdenum mine closure and the resultant 300 displaced workforce in Questa, including building a workforce training program tailored to the interests and abilities of displaced employees.

EPA grants waiver for dam; Bradner project now eligible for federal funding

BYLINE: Mercy Lopez

SECTION: LOCAL NEWS

LENGTH: 665 words

The city of Las Vegas has overcome a major hurdle in its quest to come up with the final funding piece for its Bradner Reservoir enlargement project.

The city recently applied for $20 million in funding for the project from the New Mexico Finance Authority under the United States Environmental Protection Agency Drinking Water State Revolving Loan Fund program. But it was notified that under EPA rules, dams typically aren't funded with that money.

The city applied for a waiver and was able to get Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan to support the request.

At Wednesday's City Council meeting, Mayor Alfonso Ortiz announced that the EPA had granted the waiver.

"Without this waiver, we would have been hurting significantly...," Ortiz said.

While the New Mexico Finance Authority has been supportive of the city's funding request, city officials stress that the money from the Revolving Loan Fund program has not yet been allocated. The waiver simply means that the Bradner project is eligible for the funding.

Nevertheless, getting a waiver from the EPA is a major accomplishment, representatives of the New Mexico congressional delegation told city officials.

"An EPA waiver -- I think it's a small miracle that it happened," said Pam Garcia, of Lujan's office.

Ortiz agreed.

"It is a small miracle," he said. "To get the waiver we requested, they had to change to rules. I'm pleasantly shocked. If there was no waiver, it would have stopped us to a large extent, financially."

Garcia also commended the city and its residents for being willing to shoulder part of the financial burden of the massive project through phased-in water rate increases. She said those rate increases demonstrate to funding agencies that the city is willing to do its part to make the project a reality.

Garcia, and Patricia Dominguez, of Heinrich's office, and Carlos Sanchez, of Udall's office, were presented with resolutions from the governing body thanking Udall, Heinrich and Lujan for their support of the Bradner project.

The project comes with a roughly $30 million price tag, but the city had previously secured nearly $2 million in funding from the state to design the project. State lawmakers this year appropriated another $10 million for the project. Then in June, the state Water Trust Board approved an additional $4 million for Bradner, with 90 percent of the funding in the form of a grant and the remaining 10 percent a low interest loan.

The city had previously sought $16 million from the Legislature, saying it could raise the remaining $12 million through revenue bonds.

City Utilities Director Ken Garcia said the waiver is a major milestone because it gets the city closer to completing the funding package for the project. He said the NMFA board will consider the city's funding application on Sept. 25.

He thanked the city's governing body, the congressional delegation and the community for supporting the project.

City officials have said the Bradner project will triple the amount of water storage the city currently has.

The city now has the ability to store about 1,000 acre-feet of water, which roughly equates to a four-month supply. The Bradner enlargement project would give the city the ability to store a year's worth of water, which is critical to its ability to deal with such things as prolonged droughts or a fire in the Gallinas Watershed, where the city gets most of its water.

In their letter of support for the waiver, the congressional delegation noted that Las Vegas is classified as an extremely disadvantaged community.

"Without access to this loan, the city will be required to divert funds intended for other elements of their water system, preventing them from providing a reliable source of drinking water to city residents," the delegation wrote. "The city has worked on the Bradner Dam proposal for several years and has identified enlargement of the dam as the most cost effective way to meet the city's drinking water needs."

LUJAN ANNOUNCES $650,000 GRANT IN SUPPORT OF HISPANIC-SERVING INSTITUTIONS FOR UNM-TAOS

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 292 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District announced today that the University of New Mexico-Taos has been selected to receive nearly $650,000 through the Developing Hispanic-Serving Institutions (HSI) Program. The program, which is administered through the U.S. Department of Education, provides competitive grants to help HSIs expand educational opportunities for Hispanic students and enhance their academic offerings, program quality, and institutional stability. To be designated an HSI, an institution must have an undergraduate full-time equivalent enrollment of at least 25 percent Hispanic students.

"UNM-Taos has provided a strong educational foundation for the many students it has served," Congressman Lujan said. "This grant will support its efforts to provide more students with a quality education and enhance the opportunities for distance learning - opportunities that are an essential component for students in rural communities."

UNM-Taos will receive $649,492 in the first year of a five-year project period that ends in 2019. The college will partner with Adams State College in southern Colorado and New Mexico Highlands University to address barriers of geography, distance, and under-funded K-16 education systems that have impacted access to postsecondary opportunities for residents in the region. The project is focused on increasing the number of Hispanics and other students enrolling and succeeding in programs at the three schools, increasing the number of distance education courses available to students in northern New Mexico, and increasing the retention, success and graduation rates of students at each institution.

Navajo lawmaker seeks better deal on land divide

BYLINE: FELICIA FONSECA, Associated Press

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL

LENGTH: 585 words

DATELINE: FLAGSTAFF, Ariz.

FLAGSTAFF, Ariz. (AP) - A hard-fought measure pending in Congress that would split land from a former New Mexico Army base between two American Indian tribes took an uncertain turn this week when a Navajo Nation lawmaker derailed a tribal proposal supporting the move.

Navajo lawmaker Edmund Yazzie got the land split off a Tribal Council agenda, saying he could get a better deal. Most of his colleagues disagree, and the Zuni Tribe said it isn't interesting in renegotiating.

The more than 31 square miles of land at Fort Wingate was offered to the tribes after Congress shut down the Army installation in 1993. Both tribes claim aboriginal ties to it.

Navajo and Zuni officials endorsed a bill in the U.S. House that would give each tribe about half the land with access to Interstate 40 near Gallup, New Mexico, and to cultural sites. It came after nearly two decades of negotiation.

Yazzie was part of the negotiations but now says his constituents disagree with the measure introduced by Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-New Mexico, and co-sponsored by Rep. Steve Pearce, R-New Mexico. Yazzie wants the entire northern portion of the land, which would block direct access for Zuni to the interstate, and a provision that says neither tribe can build a casino.

"I don't think Washington (D.C.) should be telling us what to do," he said Thursday.

The Navajo Nation already operates a casino near Gallup, and tribal officials said they don't want direct competition should Zuni enter the casino business. The Zuni Tribe, which has an unemployment rate of about 65 percent, sent a letter to New Mexico Gov. Susana Martinez earlier this year expressing interest in negotiating to open a casino.

Darrell Tsabetsaye, director of special projects for the Zuni Tribe, said Thursday that the tribe isn't jumping into gambling at this point. But, he said: "It's not fair for one sovereign nation to limit another sovereign nation on what they can do and cannot do."

If the Navajo Nation delays much further, the two tribes could end up with nothing, Tsabetsaye said.

"They're not only going to hurt their people, but they're going to hurt the Zuni Tribe as well," he said.

Clara Pratte, director of the Navajo Nation's office in Washington, D.C., said she believes Yazzie changed course on the agreement because he received unexpected backlash from his constituents. She said Navajo officials need to do a better job explaining the bill to tribal members because if the measure dies, reintroducing it is going to be a tough sell.

Lujan, Pearce and Rep. Don Young, R-Alaska, who chairs the House Subcommittee on Indian and Alaska Native Affairs, made clear in a letter to the tribes in June 2013 that the land had to be divided equitably, each tribe would get contiguous parcels and each would have access to I-40.

The letter also requested that tribal officials with decision-making authority be part of the negotiations so that any agreement would carry weight, Young's spokesman, Matt Shuckerow, said.

Lujan's spokesman, Andrew Stoddard, said the congressman is waiting for official buy-in from the tribes before moving forward with the legislation, although the agreement doesn't specifically require approval from the tribal councils.

Pearce said he's growing impatient after tribal officials agreed the split was equitable and now it appears Yazzie is reneging on the agreement.

"It has taken far more time than it should have taken, and it's unthinkable now for him to say, 'Let's open renegotiations,'" Pearce told The Associated Press.

Lujan Statement on House Republican Bills that Undermines Human Trafficking Law and Protections for DREAMers

LENGTH: 329 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement tonight on House Republicans' legislation that fails to provide adequate funding for the humanitarian crisis at the border, weakens a human trafficking law, and eliminates protections for DREAMers.

"The legislation introduced today by House Republicans fails to live up to the values that make our nation so great. Children from Central American, children as young as five years old, have risked their lives to escape extreme violence that has gripped Guatamala, El Salvador, and the murder capital of the world, Honduras.

"Instead of working with Democrats in a bipartisan manner to pass comprehensive immigration reform that addresses the humanitarian crisis on the border and fixes our broken immigration system, House Republicans have veered even further to the extreme right. Their legislative package weakens protections for victims of violence and human trafficking, fails to provide the resources necessary to improve the situation at the border, and weakens protections for DREAMers - kids who were brought here through no fault of their own and have worked to build a better life for themselves and their communities. In addition, it makes a distressing change for victims of domestic abuse who are seeking a visa to stay in the country. By eliminating the ability for a victim to continue working during the application process, it would leave many victims unable to make a living, increasing the chances they would have to rely on their abuser during that period.

"Pope Francis said, 'this humanitarian emergency requires, as a first urgent measure, these children be welcomed and protected.' Sadly in the House of Representatives, those words and that sentiment have been ignored by my Republican colleagues."

BYLINE: by TARGETED NEWS SERVICE, Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 909 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON, Aug. 10 -- There were three key votes in the House this week; the House held a total of seven roll call votes in the week ending Thursday. The Senate held no roll call votes this week. The most important House vote was to pass a bill providing supplemental appropriations for the remainder of fiscal 2014, funding immigration programs, including caring for and processing unaccompanied alien children who have crossed the U.S.-Mexico border. On last Saturday, Congress began its August recess, and it is not scheduled to return to legislative session until September 8.

The Senate, by voice vote, passed the following measures: a bill (H.J. Res. 76), sponsored by Rep. Rodney P. Frelinghuysen, R-N.J., to provide $225 million, available until the end of September 2015, to provide Israel with equipment for its Iron Dome system for defending against rockets fired into Israel by Hamas and other groups; the Money Remittances Improvement Act (H.R. 4386), sponsored by Rep. Keith Ellison, D-Minn., to allow the Treasury Secretary to rely on state examinations for certain financial institutions to determine compliance with reporting requirements on monetary instrument transactions; and the Emergency Afghan Allies Extension Act (H.R. 5195), sponsored by Rep. Earl Blumenauer, D-Ore., to provide 1,000 additional visas for the Afghan Special Immigrant Visa program in 2014.

The House also passed a resolution (H. Res. 683), sponsored by Rep. Juan Vargas, D-Calif., to express the sense of the House on the urgent need to protect religious minorities from persecution from the Islamic State in Iraq and Levant (ISIL) as it expands its control over areas of Iraq; and passed a resolution (H. Res. 699), sponsored by Rep. Gregory W. Meeks, D-N.Y., to welcome African leaders to the first United States-Africa Leaders' Summit and welcome African trade ministers to the 13th forum of the African Growth and Opportunity Act.

Here's a look at how area members of Congress voted over the previous week.

There were no key votes in the Senate this week.

HOUSE VOTES:

House Vote 1:

ADDRESSING INFLUX OF CENTRAL AMERICAN CHILDREN: House has passed a bill (H.R. 5230), sponsored by Rep. Harold Rogers, R-Ky., to provide $659 million of supplemental appropriations for the 2014 fiscal year. The funding would cover increased security levels at the U.S.-Mexico border, an increased capacity for immigration courts to handle the recent influx of unaccompanied children from Central America, and $197 million to care for the children while they are in U.S. custody, and change the law to ensure that unaccompanied children from countries that do not border the U.S. are treated the same, for the purpose of returning them to their countries, as unaccompanied children from Canada and Mexico. Rogers called the bill "a fair, sensible, and reasonable address of the most immediate needs on the border. It also puts in place much-needed policy changes that should stop the flow of unaccompanied children who are being put at risk during their long, dangerous journey through Mexico." A bill opponent, Rep. Nita M. Lowey, D-N.Y., said the funding was insufficient to allow immigration agencies to handle the unaccompanied children, and Lowey criticized the attempt to change immigration policy in a hurried fashion. The vote, on August 1, was 223 yeas to 189 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 2:

DEFERRED ACTION AGAINST ILLEGAL ALIEN IMMIGRANTS: The House has passed a bill (H.R. 5272), sponsored by Rep. Marsha Blackburn, R-Tenn., that would bar federal government agencies from considering applications for deferred deportation by illegal alien residents of the U.S. who arrived in the country as children and bar the agencies from authorizing those aliens to work in the U.S. Blackburn said the bill would effectively revoke a 2012 executive order from President Obama that illegitimately ordered deferred action on the illegal alien residents, a power that Blackburn said the Constitution reserves solely to Congress. A bill opponent, Rep. Kathy Castor, D-Fla., said it was "moving us farther away from immigration reform, farther away from justice, farther away from smart policy to utilize the talents of young men and women who love America, and farther away from the values America holds dear." The vote, on August 1, was 216 yeas to 192 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 3:

FUNDING ISRAEL'S MISSILE DEFENSE SYSTEM: The House has passed a motion sponsored by Rep. Harold Rogers, R-Ky., to concur in the Senate amendments to a bill (H.J. Res. 76), to make continuing appropriations for the National Nuclear Security Administration for fiscal 2014. The amendments would provide $225 million, available until the end of September 2015, to provide Israel with equipment for its Iron Dome system for defending against rockets fired into Israel by Hamas and other groups. There was no debate on the House floor. The vote, on August 1, was 395 yeas to 8 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

Martinez campaign ad attacks King's record in Legislature

SECTION: METRO & NEW MEXICO; Pg. C1

LENGTH: 476 words

In her most recent TV ad, Gov. Susana Martinez's re-election campaign takes aim at Democratic opponent Gary King's voting record and last name.

The ad, which was launched this week, portrays King wearing a crown while a narrator says, "It's good to be the King."

The ad describes a tax increase package that King voted for in 1987- his first year in a 12-year stint in the state House of Representatives - as the "largest in history."

However, 2010 tax hikes signed into law by Martinez's predecessor, Democratic Gov. Bill Richardson, during a lean state budget year were actually larger, dollar-wise, than the 1987 package proposed by then-Republican Gov. Garrey Carruthers.

King, now New Mexico's attorney general, said Friday he does not regret voting in favor of the increase on gasoline and income taxes, among others.

"Had we not raised taxes, we would have had to significantly curtail the (public) education system," King told the Journal.

The ad also targets King's votes on several legislator compensation measures, saying, "... Gary King took good care of himself. King repeatedly voted to raise his own pay. Voted to sweeten his taxpayer-funded retirement."

King said he did not recall voting to increase the size of legislative pensions, but acknowledged supporting a bill that would have given a salary to lawmakers. He said he still supports such a concept.

Democrats in New Mexico's congressional delegation have criticized the state Human Services Department's shakeup of the behavioral health system and asked a federal agency to keep closer tabs on the department.

Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and Reps. Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham said this week there were irregularities in HSD's suspension of Medicaid payments to 15 non-profits, 12 of which were later replaced by Arizona firms.

They said the audit that prompted the suspensions last year was flawed, there was a lack of transparency, and the shakeup jeopardized services to some of the most vulnerable New Mexicans.

In a letter to Health and Human Services Secretary Sylvia Burwell, the Democrats said they had "serious questions" about whether HSD has an effective process to determine whether fraud allegations are credible. They called the payment suspensions "a de facto termination from the state's Medicaid program without any meaningful due process."

The Democrats urged HHS to "vigorously increase oversight" of the suspension process and its aftermath.

There was a barbed response from Republican Gov. Susana Martinez's administration.

"It's no surprise that Washington politicians don't see a problem" with improper use of Medicaid money, "but we will continue to root out waste, fraud and abuse to ensure Medicaid funds are protected for those who need it most," said HSD's Matt Kennicott.

Democrats seek oversight of state Medicaid agency

SANTA FE, N.M. (AP) - Democrats in New Mexico's congressional delegation are asking for more federal oversight of the state Human Services Department because it suspended Medicaid payments to 15 mental health providers last year.

Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and Reps. Michelle Lujan Grisham and Ben Ray Lujan made the request to U.S. Health and Human Services Secretary Sylvia Burwell.

The state suspended payments because of fraud and overbilling allegations, and contracted with Arizona companies to take over management of most of the suspended providers.

The system changed in January as Medicaid managed care companies assumed responsibility for behavioral services and contracting with providers.

The congressional letter expressed concerns that services have been disrupted.

But Human Services spokesman Matt Kennicott said more people are receiving services since the transition to the Arizona providers.

Congressional Dems seek oversight of state Human Services

BYLINE: Patrick Malone, The Santa Fe New Mexican

LENGTH: 630 words

Aug. 08--In a letter to President Barack Obama's Cabinet secretary for Health and Human Services, Democrats in New Mexico's congressional delegation on Wednesday criticized Republican Gov. Susana Martinez's abrupt shake-up last year of the state's behavioral health care system.

U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham chided the New Mexico Human Services Department, accusing it of prematurely ousting more than a dozen behavioral health providers without due process and causing disruptions in the providers' employment and care for the state's mentally ill and people with substance abuse problems.

"We have heard from numerous constituents including families, consumers, advocates and providers about a frayed behavioral health system," stated the letter to U.S. Health and Human Services Secretary Sylvia Burwell.

The state Human Services Department responded by defending its actions.

"If these politicians want to stand on the side of defending and excusing rampant overbilling in Medicaid, and the siphoning of millions of Medicaid dollars away from those most in need, that's their prerogative," department spokesman Matt Kennicott said. "Meanwhile, we have worked diligently to stop this abuse of taxpayer money and ensure that New Mexicans in need are receiving behavioral health services."

In June 2013, the state Human Services Department froze funding to 15 New Mexico-based providers of behavioral health services, citing credible allegations of Medicaid billing fraud totaling up to $36 million. Three of the companies reached settlement agreements with the state and resumed providing services.

The congressional delegation referenced inconsistencies in the damning audit, which State Auditor Hector Balderas recently discussed with a panel of state lawmakers.

Reviews of two of the terminated companies by the New Mexico Attorney General's Office found no proof of fraud, although the investigation into one of the companies, Santa Fe-based Easter Seals El Mirador, has been reopened at the request of the Human Services Department.

"If a state can establish a credible allegation of fraud based on a haphazard determination of potential overbilling," the letter read, "there is nothing preventing it from shutting down any statewide network of safety net providers based on what could turn out to be baseless allegations."

The New Mexico providers were replaced by five Arizona companies, which received $24 million in state support to take over behavioral health services. A review of payment records to the company conducted by The New Mexican showed that executives billed the state between $200 and $300 per hour for tasks such as creating security badges for employees and waiting for flights in airports. Additionally, one of the Arizona companies, Agave Health, billed the state for services months before the audit accusing the New Mexico providers of fraud had been completed.

Now, Easter Seals El Mirador and The Counseling Center of Alamogordo, which the Attorney General's Office cleared of fraud, have initiated legal actions seeking Medicaid funds that were withheld from them by the state.

The congressional delegation urged the federal government to take a more active oversight role in the state's behavioral health system.

"We continue to hear reports of lack of access to services for this very vulnerable population and want to work with you to ensure that anyone who needs care gets it without delay," the members of Congress wrote.

Lujan Statement on House Republican Bills that Undermines Human Trafficking Law and Protections for DREAMers

LENGTH: 329 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement tonight on House Republicans' legislation that fails to provide adequate funding for the humanitarian crisis at the border, weakens a human trafficking law, and eliminates protections for DREAMers.

"The legislation introduced today by House Republicans fails to live up to the values that make our nation so great. Children from Central American, children as young as five years old, have risked their lives to escape extreme violence that has gripped Guatamala, El Salvador, and the murder capital of the world, Honduras.

"Instead of working with Democrats in a bipartisan manner to pass comprehensive immigration reform that addresses the humanitarian crisis on the border and fixes our broken immigration system, House Republicans have veered even further to the extreme right. Their legislative package weakens protections for victims of violence and human trafficking, fails to provide the resources necessary to improve the situation at the border, and weakens protections for DREAMers - kids who were brought here through no fault of their own and have worked to build a better life for themselves and their communities. In addition, it makes a distressing change for victims of domestic abuse who are seeking a visa to stay in the country. By eliminating the ability for a victim to continue working during the application process, it would leave many victims unable to make a living, increasing the chances they would have to rely on their abuser during that period.

"Pope Francis said, 'this humanitarian emergency requires, as a first urgent measure, these children be welcomed and protected.' Sadly in the House of Representatives, those words and that sentiment have been ignored by my Republican colleagues."

Lujan: House Republicans Want to Weaken Protections for Children Fleeing Human Trafficking and Go After DREAMers

LENGTH: 340 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District and First Vice Chair of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus (CHC) joined members of the House Democratic Leadership and CHC at a press conference today in the Capitol. Luján discussed House Republicans' attempts to weaken human trafficking laws and DREAMer protections as part of legislation addressing the humanitarian crisis at the border. Below are his remarks. Click here to watch the press conference. Luján also spoke on the House floor earlier this morning about this important issue. His speech is available here.

"Yesterday we saw a House Republican conference that was in disarray because Ted Cruz and a sizable number of their members were not satisfied with a bill that they drafted that would strip away due process from children who are trying to escape the most unimaginable violence that has gripped Guatemala, El Salvador, and Honduras - the murder capital of the world.

"The stories of violence, sexual abuse, and human trafficking are heartbreaking. You've reported on them. But it wasn't enough for House Republicans to weaken anti human trafficking laws, taking away the opportunity for these young people to tell their stories - they'll be sending them back to the very traffickers and rapists they are trying to escape.

"Today we are hearing from House Republicans that now they want to add provisions to go after DREAMers, children who were brought to this country through no fault of their own and have grown up here in the only home they have known, contributing to the greatest nation in the world.

"Rather than working with Democrats in a bipartisan way, House Republicans again are giving into the most extreme wing of their party to bring a mean-spirited bill that will break up families and go after those who want to build a better life for themselves, their families, and their communities.

Lujan: House Republicans to Sue the President Instead of Addressing the Priorities of the American People

LENGTH: 255 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján released the following statement today after House Republicans moved forward with legislation supporting a lawsuit against the President rather than addressing critical issues facing the country.

"Today House Republicans hit a new low with their frivolous lawsuit against President Obama. Rather than spend time bringing legislation to the floor that grows our economy, spurs job creation, makes college more affordable, or fixes our broken immigration system, House Republicans wasted more time playing politics and attacking President Obama for doing what they have failed to do - act on the pressing issues facing our country.

"The American people want leaders who will work on real solutions to strengthen the middle class and create good jobs in our communities. All House Republicans have to offer is a lawsuit against the President that has been widely criticized by numerous legal scholars. House Democrats have an agenda to strengthen the middle class by providing affordable, quality education; investing in roads and bridges; ensuring equal work for equal pay; and providing incentives to create good jobs right here at home. With only days left before the House begins the August district work period, our focus should be on the priorities of the American people, not a political stunt aimed to appease members of the Tea Party."

Lujan Statement on Passage of VA Reform Legislation

LENGTH: 252 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after the passage of the Conference Report for the Veterans' Access to Care through Choice, Accountability, and Transparency Act - legislation to address the serious problems impacting veterans' health care at VA facilities across the country.

"The disturbing reports of misconduct at VA facilities in Albuquerque and across the country are deeply disappointing and strike at the very heart of our commitment to our veterans. This legislation takes important steps that can help rebuild the trust of America's veterans by providing key funding to reduce the VA backlog, hire new medical personnel at VA hospitals and clinics, and allow the VA to lease new medical facilities.

"This legislation will not fix all of the problems plaguing the VA and I would have preferred a bill that includes more funding for our veterans, but it addresses many of the failures that left veterans without timely access to health care, and it is the beginning of what must be an ongoing process to make systematic reforms that honor the sacrifice of the men and women who honorably served our country. It is critical that the Senate also passes this legislation before leaving for the August district work period so we can get it to the President's desk and signed into law."

Lujan Takes to House Floor to Discusses Humanitarian Crisis at the Border and Human Trafficking

LENGTH: 681 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District spoke on the House floor yesterday evening during debate on a number of bills aimed at combating human and sex trafficking. Luján highlighted the importance of protecting children from violence and the need to do the same for children who are fleeing extreme violence in Central America. Below are Luján's remarks.

"I rise today in support of this legislation and many other bills we are considering that deal with human and sex trafficking - an important issue, a critical issue - especially as it relates to protecting children who are too often victims of abuse and violence, and I commend the Speaker for bringing these bills up for a vote.

"Mr. Speaker, as I was watching the debate this evening I couldn't help but come back to the floor. I hope all of my colleagues that are speaking tonight on the importance of passing these human trafficking bills will join us next week to talk about the importance of protecting children. It was with alarm, Mr. Speaker, that I read a letter that Speaker Boehner penned to President Barack Obama - that appears that my Republican colleagues when they left the meeting earlier this afternoon, are asking to take away the very protections from children [from] a law that was passed in 2008 - [yet they] are asking to protect these children tonight.

"So I come today to ask my colleagues to read the transcripts, to hear the debate this evening, and to think about it - to go home this weekend and whatever faith that we may be, that we pray about it and we talk to our pastors and our religious leaders about it. Because these kids that we are going to be talking about next week are the very children that need protections as well.

"The motivation to pass these bills today is the same motivation that moved this body to pass legislation that became law in 2008 - to protect children. This law has since become the subject of much condemnation from many of my Republican colleagues as we discuss the humanitarian crisis on the border.

"We are here on this floor debating legislation to protect children, yet many of my colleagues want to take away due process from children who are trying to escape unimaginable violence in Central America. In Honduras, the murder capital of the world, the violence was captured in a story recently, and I apologize for the graphic nature of this story.

"The story that was reported on - 'during a recent late-night visit to the San Pedro Sula morgue, more than 60 bodies, all victims of violence, were seen piled in a heap, each wrapped in a brown plastic bag. While picking bullets out of a 15-year-old boy shot 15 times, technicians discussed how they regularly received corpses of children under 10, and sometimes as young as 2. Last week, in nearby Santa Barbara, an 11-year-old had his throat slit by other children, because he did not pay a 50-cent extortion fee.'

"The doctor at the morgue said, before we saw children being killed because they were at the scene when gangs were coming to prey on families and they just happened to be there. Now we're seeing kids kill kids. There are hundreds of other stories like this, of which I will ask to submit into the record with extraneous materials, but Mr. Speaker, I beg and I plead of my colleagues - each and every one of us that may or may not have been here when the law was passed, but those of us who are here now - these are kids. And I know that you and I, Mr. Speaker, that we love children and we want to make sure they are not victims of these horrific crimes.

"Please, please take this weekend and ask the Speaker [Boehner] to remove the provisions that would take away the due process from these children. And as we pass these bills together, let us not forget what brought this Congress together in 2008 to protect these children. Let us show the same compassion that is the driving force of these bills tonight."

NM delegation talks pot policy

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN Journal Washington Bureau

SECTION: EDITORIALS; Pg. B2

LENGTH: 753 words

Did you see the "Meet the Press" segment on marijuana legalization last Sunday?

If not, you didn't miss much - except the irritating spectacle of smug Beltway insiders making lame jokes about one of the most interesting public policy experiments of our time.

Host David Gregory, reportedly on thin ice because of his cellar-dwelling ratings, kicked off what could have been a lively debate by mentioning last Sunday's landmark New York Times editorial calling for federal pot legalization.

Times columnist David Brooks, who recently wrote a tortured piece explaining how he and his friends used to enjoy smoking weed but now he thinks it's bad, set the condescending tone.

"I don't know what they've been smoking up there in the (Times) office. The haze is...," at which point the panel erupted in chuckles.

"When I think of grass, I think of something to walk on," Judy Woodruff of PBS chimed in. "I think of pot as something you put a plant in."

Thanks for that insight, Judy. As "elite" media pundits embarrass themselves on national television with silly, self-satisfied bromides, cities and states are wrestling with the very serious notion of legalizing, decriminalizing or otherwise changing marijuana laws.

In Colorado and Washington, pot possession is now legal. In Albuquerque and Santa Fe, residents are scrambling to put decriminalization on the ballot. As of this month in Washington, D.C., possession of an ounce of pot or less is punishable by a $25 fine.

Members of Congress have long been reluctant to even discuss, much less legislate on, the issue. Last week, I briefly interviewed New Mexico's congressional delegation on pot policy. To their credit they took my questions seriously, but with the exception of Rep. Steve Pearce, the delegation's lone Republican, none took a firm stand for or against changing the federal law.

"I think it's time that it becomes a part of our policy debate," said Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, a Democrat. "Because Congress has done nothing about it - we don't want to touch it - you've got local communities and states trying to figure out what to do.

"We've got more myths about marijuana than we do facts. I'm encouraged that the FDA is now studying marijuana so we'll have more information. I'm certainly supportive of New Mexico or anybody else who wants to get that on the ballot and see what voters think, but there are always unintended consequences. I'm aware of that."

Democratic Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich advocated a wait and see approach.

"Why don't we watch Washington and Colorado for a couple of years and see what the results are there," Udall said. "I think that's a very legitimate approach."

Udall, a former attorney general, said his understanding is that police in New Mexico rarely jail people for small amounts of marijuana, something he described as "de facto" decriminalization.

"The law enforcement community has been very smart to actually decriminalize, in fact," Udall said. "If you ask the question 'do people go to jail for a small amount of personal marijuana?' the answer in New Mexico as far as I know, I don't think you're going to find anybody. Small amounts, personal use in the home you're not going to find anything."

Heinrich acknowledged that pot is less dangerous than cocaine, methamphetamine or other hard drugs.

"But I'm also cautious about where we're going, and before people jump forward and assume they have all the answers on this stuff it would be smart to look at the states that are starting down this road, and to take some time and look at what works and what does not," he said. "I think we need to be cautious."

Pearce said he is staunchly opposed to any relaxation of marijuana laws.

"Anytime you're going to legalize stuff that makes it harder to raise families and provide a productive workforce you just undermine the long-term prosperity of the nation," Pearce said.

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, a Democrat, said "the data is showing there should definitely be more support for decriminalization in some instances, but I still want to see everything that's out there."

Lujan also pointed to a 2013 vote of Congress to remove hemp - a type of cannabis sativa used to make rope, wax, paper and other products - from the list of federally controlled substances as a sign of change.

"I would say that's a reflection that at least some elected officials that represent the United States have changed their approach to the way they are looking at this subject and are open to conversation," Lujan said.

ADVOCACY 101: HOW TO ASK MEMBERS OF CONGRESS TO SUPPORT H.R. 4190

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 1298 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, DC

The following information was released by the American Pharmacists Association (APhA):

APhA Trustees Tery Baskin, PharmD, FAPhA, and Nicki Hilliard, PharmD, MHSA, BCNP, FAPhA, visit all of the Arkansas congressional offices on Capitol Hill on June 23 to seek support for provider status legislation (H.R. 4190).

Melody Ryan, PharmD, MPH, BCPS, CGP, FCCP, FAPhA, of Lexington, KY, recently went to Capitol Hill for the first time to meet with her Members of Congress or their staff in their Washington, DC offices. During the meetings, she emphasized that H.R. 4190 would provide patients in her largely rural state expanded access to health care through their pharmacists.

Ryan visited the offices of Rep. Andy Barr (R-KY) and Sens. Mitch McConnell (R-KY) and Rand Paul (R-KY), and described the meetings as "positive with some interest." Ryan is a professor in the Departments of Pharmacy Practice and Science and Neurology and Director of International Professional Student Education at the University of Kentucky College of Pharmacy. She practices in neurology ambulatory care.

"I didn't feel that it was much different than talking with patients," Ryan told Pharmacy Today. "It was just policy instead of medicines that I was discussing."

Ideal time for unified voice

Now is the time for pharmacists and student pharmacists to advocate for H.R. 4190 to their Members of Congress.

The month of August is traditionally a quiet time in Washington, DC, with Members of Congress back home in their congressional districts and states. It's an ideal time for pharmacists and student pharmacists to bring their messages directly to lawmakers in a unified voice.

APhA is part of the Patient Access to Pharmacists' Care Coalition, whose mission is to develop and help enact federal legislation that would enable patient access to, and coverage for, Medicare Part B services by state-licensed pharmacists in medically underserved communities. H.R. 4190 was introduced March 11, 2014, by Reps. Brett Guthrie (R-KY), G.K. Butterfield (D-NC), and Todd Young (R-IN). As Today went to press, the bill had amassed 82 cosponsors.

As the President of the APhA Academy of Pharmaceutical Research and Science and an APhA Trustee, Ryan hit the Hill in conjunction with APhA's Board of Trustees on June 23. That day, the Board fanned out across House and Senate offices to talk to their legislators and their staff about provider status.

On the House side, APhA Board members asked representatives and their staff to cosponsor H.R. 4190, wrote APhA Executive Vice President and CEO Thomas E. Menighan, BSPharm, MBA, ScD (Hon), FAPhA, in a June 30 CEO Blog post on pharmacist.com. On the Senate side, although a bill in the Senate had not yet been introduced as Today went to press, APhA Board members informed senators and their staff about pharmacists' abilities and knowledge and updated them on H.R. 4190.

"H.R. 4190 and provider status broadly remains our number one advocacy priority," said APhA President Matthew C. Osterhaus, BSPharm, FASCP, FAPhA, co-owner of Osterhaus Pharmacy in Maquoketa, IA.

Ways of building relationships

Pharmacists and student pharmacists can find out whether their Member of Congress is a cosponsor of H.R. 4190 at https://beta.congress.gov/bill/113th-congress/house-bill/4190/cosponsors. If not, they can ask their Members of Congress to support H.R. 4190 in a number of different ways.

"You don't have to go to Washington, DC, to advocate with your Member of Congress," said APhA Senior Vice President of Government Affairs and Pharmacy Practice Stacie Maass, BSPharm, JD.

Beyond visiting a Member of Congress's office in Washington, DC, a few ways to advocate include sending a letter; making a phone call; and visiting a district office. These are described below.

More ways to advocate for H.R. 4190 include arranging a pharmacy visit; becoming a member of and getting involved in APhA and other pharmacy associations at the national, state, and local levels; giving to any pharmacy association's political action committee (PAC); and sharing a story through APhA's Pharmacists Provide Care campaign. For more information about these or for information about the APhA-PAC, visit PharmacistsProvideCare.com.

"To get in at the grassroots level and try to change things, working both with your representative's local office and your state pharmacy association is incredibly important," said Ernie Dole, PharmD, PhC, a clinical pharmacist at University of New Mexico Hospital's Pain Consultation and Treatment Center. "That way, you can begin to build relationships so that when issues like this come up, the staffer knows who you are."

And here's Dole's advice to pharmacists and student pharmacists who are embarking on political advocacy for the first time: "Just do it."

Letters, phone calls

A letter tool is available through APhA's website. APhA members can log in to compose and send a message to their legislator.

"I used [the letter tool] and then I tweaked it," said Nicki Hilliard, PharmD, MHSA, BCNP, FAPhA, a professor of pharmacy practice at the University of Arkansas for Medical Sciences College of Pharmacy and a leader in nuclear pharmacy practice. She is President of the APhA Academy of Pharmacy Practice and Management and an APhA Trustee. "I made it more personal. I told them who I am and my position, and made it relate to the state of Arkansas."

Dale Tinker, Executive Director of the New Mexico Pharmacists Association, pointed out that all three members of his state's congressional delegation in the U.S. House of Representatives are cosponsors of H.R. 4190. Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-NM) cosigned April 28, Rep. Ben Ray Lujan (D-NM) cosigned May 19, and Rep. Stevan Pearce (R-NM) cosigned July 10. Several pharmacists already had close relationships with their Members of Congress and reached out with personal phone calls to seek their support for the bill, Tinker said.

Dole and Joe Anderson, PharmD, PhC, both convinced Lujan Grisham to cosponsor the bill. Lujan Grisham "has always been a strong supporter of pharmacy," Dole said. "I talked to one of her staff members about H.R. 4190. I had dealt with her staffer before and had her phone number, so I just called and sort of picked up the conversation," he continued. "It was easy just to call her specifically for that topic. I had some level of credibility, and so her staffer asked what was the bill about, and how it would help the health care of New Mexicans." The congressional staffer got the bill number, did some research on her own, and took that toLujan Grisham.

District offices

In late June, the district staff of Reps. Judy Chu (D-CA), Linda Sanchez (D-CA), Adam Schiff (D-CA), and Brad Sherman (D-CA) met with several student pharmacists, pharmacists, and other health professionals to learn about H.R. 4190, according to Daniel Kudryashov, a 2015 PharmD candidate at the University of Southern California School of Pharmacy and the recipient of the 2014 APhA Good Government Student Pharmacist of the Year Award.

"Setting up a meeting in a local congressional district office is very simple," Kudryashov said. "I just called the congressional district office and inquired about the office scheduler's e-mail address. Then I sent an e-mail to the scheduler, directly stating that I wanted to schedule a meeting with the Congressman or a member of staff. I also noted the reason for my meeting request, the names of the other constituents who would be attending, and the date I wanted to schedule the meeting on. That was it! After a short e-mail exchange, the meeting was scheduled."

Talking points for H.R. 4190

Talking points, maps, and more information about H.R. 4190 are available at PharmacistsProvideCare.com and at www.pharmacist.com/get-facts-provider-status.

NM representatives split votes on airfare advertising; Pearce backed House bill, Lujan Grisham didn't, Luján missed voice vote

BYLINE: JOURNAL STAFF REPORT

LENGTH: 244 words

New Mexico's three U.S. representatives split their support earlier this week - on a voice vote in the House - that rejected consumers' complaints and passed legislation letting airline advertising emphasize the base price of tickets, before taxes and fees are added.

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., did not support it.

"Congress must both ensure that consumers are protected and provided accurate, accessible pricing information, and airlines are treated fairly," Lujan Grisham said. "As currently written, the Transparent Airfares Act falls short in balancing those fundamental goals."

Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., said he supported the legislation because "it provided more transparency," according to a spokeswoman.

Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., supported it, but he was not present on the floor for the voice vote, not uncommon for that kind of proceeding.

"Rep. Luján supports truth in billing and is OK with airlines breaking down the cost as long as it is abundantly clear what the total cost of the ticket is before a consumer purchases it," said Andrew Stoddard, a spokesman for Luján. "We'll watch to see how this is implemented if it is signed into law."

The legislation would roll back federal regulations that since 2012 have required ads to prominently display the full ticket price.

Under the bill, the base price would have to be the one most prominently shown in ads as long as taxes and fees are displayed separately, such as in footnotes or pop-up ads.

LUJAN STATEMENT ON HOUSE REPUBLICAN BILLS THAT UNDERMINES HUMAN TRAFFICKING LAW AND PROTECTIONS FOR DREAMERS;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 334 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement tonight on House Republicans' legislation that fails to provide adequate funding for the humanitarian crisis at the border, weakens a human trafficking law, and eliminates protections for DREAMers.

"The legislation introduced today by House Republicans fails to live up to the values that make our nation so great. Children from Central American, children as young as five years old, have risked their lives to escape extreme violence that has gripped Guatamala, El Salvador, and the murder capital of the world, Honduras.

"Instead of working with Democrats in a bipartisan manner to pass comprehensive immigration reform that addresses the humanitarian crisis on the border and fixes our broken immigration system, House Republicans have veered even further to the extreme right. Their legislative package weakens protections for victims of violence and human trafficking, fails to provide the resources necessary to improve the situation at the border, and weakens protections for DREAMers - kids who were brought here through no fault of their own and have worked to build a better life for themselves and their communities. In addition, it makes a distressing change for victims of domestic abuse who are seeking a visa to stay in the country. By eliminating the ability for a victim to continue working during the application process, it would leave many victims unable to make a living, increasing the chances they would have to rely on their abuser during that period.

"Pope Francis said, 'this humanitarian emergency requires, as a first urgent measure, these children be welcomed and protected.' Sadly in the House of Representatives, those words and that sentiment have been ignored by my Republican colleagues."

LUJAN: HOUSE REPUBLICANS WANT TO WEAKEN PROTECTIONS FOR CHILDREN FLEEING HUMAN TRAFFICKING AND GO AFTER DREAMERS;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 362 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District and First Vice Chair of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus (CHC) joined members of the House Democratic Leadership and CHC at a press conference today in the Capitol. Lujan discussed House Republicans' attempts to weaken human trafficking laws and DREAMer protections as part of legislation addressing the humanitarian crisis at the border. Below are his remarks. Click here to watch the press conference. Lujan also spoke on the House floor earlier this morning about this important issue. His speech is available here.

"Yesterday we saw a House Republican conference that was in disarray because Ted Cruz and a sizable number of their members were not satisfied with a bill that they drafted that would strip away due process from children who are trying to escape the most unimaginable violence that has gripped Guatemala, El Salvador, and Honduras - the murder capital of the world.

"The stories of violence, sexual abuse, and human trafficking are heartbreaking. You've reported on them. But it wasn't enough for House Republicans to weaken anti human trafficking laws, taking away the opportunity for these young people to tell their stories - they'll be sending them back to the very traffickers and rapists they are trying to escape.

"Today we are hearing from House Republicans that now they want to add provisions to go after DREAMers, children who were brought to this country through no fault of their own and have grown up here in the only home they have known, contributing to the greatest nation in the world.

"Rather than working with Democrats in a bipartisan way, House Republicans again are giving into the most extreme wing of their party to bring a mean-spirited bill that will break up families and go after those who want to build a better life for themselves, their families, and their communities.

"As the Conference of Catholic Bishops said, [it's like] sending them back into a burning building."

Delegation wary of possible worker plan; President reportedly weighs executive action

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: FRONT PAGE; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1105 words

WASHINGTON - If President Barack Obama decides to bypass Congress and use his executive power to offer work permits to millions of people living in the United States illegally, he'll get a mixed reception - at best - from New Mexico's congressional delegation.

The delegation's only Republican blasted the idea, and most of its Democrats this week offered less than full support. Meanwhile, some immigration advocates and lawmakers close to the White House say an executive action plan is in the works and could come before the November elections.

Obama is considering expanding a so-called deferred action program to as many as 9 million adults living in the U.S. illegally, according to The Associated Press and other media reports. The plan, which has not been formally proposed, would build on the president's 2012 executive order that granted work permits to certain young immigrants who entered the U.S. illegally. The Deferred Action for Childhood Arrivals, or DACA, program has been made available to more than 500,000 immigrants.

The possible presidential expansion of the DACA program comes in the midst of a crisis at the Mexican border, where thousands of children and adults are arriving from Central America. The status of about 11.5 million immigrants already living in the United States illegally and the recent border influx from Central America are separate issues from a legislative standpoint, except that both raise immigration problems for U.S. policymakers.

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., told the Journal on Wednesday that she sympathizes with Obama's frustration over Congress' failure to pass comprehensive immigration reform, but that she's wary of setting such an expansive work permit policy without approval of Congress.

"If we don't get Congress to set the policy, then we continue to have confusion and debates, and I think we create hostility and animosity on this immigration issue with our constituents and the public at large," Lujan Grisham said. "I think that's ineffective, and I really hope he takes that into consideration and weighs that very carefully."

A unilateral move by the White House on the issue would be sure to roil the political waters in an election year.

Republicans, including Rep. Steve Pearce of New Mexico, oppose the president's possible proposal to give more work permits to those who are in the U.S. illegally.

Pearce has long advocated expanding the guest worker program, but only through legislation.

"I might agree with it 100 percent, but I would be opposed if it were President Bush or a Republican president equally because the process is more important than the policy," Pearce told the Journal.

Pearce said an executive action by the president offering millions of undocumented workers legal permits without approval from Congress could create a constitutional crisis. "That's one of the reasons I think even Democrats are becoming alarmed with the president," Pearce said. "He is undermining the checks and balances. He is undermining the entire constitutional foundation of the republic. This is unsettling."

But Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., said the GOP has tied Obama's hands on the immigration issue and given the president little choice but to use his executive power.

Luján told the Journal that House Republican leaders should allow a vote on the comprehensive immigration policy reform bill the Senate approved last year.

"In light of the House not acting, what is the president to do?" Lujan said. "If Republicans do not want the president taking actions, then let us have a vote on the Senate bill."

The Senate bill would create a "path to citizenship" for millions of immigrants already in the U.S. illegally, double the number of Border Patrol agents, establish 700 miles of new fencing and require an E-Verify system for migrant workers, among other things. Only undocumented immigrants who entered the country before Dec. 31, 2011, could apply to legalize their status.

"Executive action is no replacement for congressional action, but as long as House Republicans refuse to allow a vote on bipartisan legislation to fix our broken immigration system, I would support President Obama taking steps to address the issue using his existing authority, including expanding DACA," Luján added.

Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., expressed reservations about the work permit proposal. Heinrich, like all Democrats in the New Mexico delegation, said the Senate immigration reform bill would be a better solution.

"I understand - and share - the administration's frustration with the lack of progress in passing comprehensive immigration reform," Heinrich said in a statement. "While I think the president should be exploring all constitutionally sound administrative options, whatever steps he takes will lack the permanence of law. So while I am interested in learning more about potential administrative fixes to our broken immigration system, it will not be a replacement for congressional action."

Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., in a statement provided to the Journal, suggested he might not object but stopped far short of endorsing the idea.

"I believe the best response to our broken immigration system is the Senate's comprehensive bill that addressed the millions of undocumented immigrants already in the country while significantly increasing border security," Udall said. "If the House won't take the action we all know is necessary, then the administration is right to investigate a range of options - within the scope of the law - to deal with the facts on the ground."

White House officials led by Domestic Policy Council Director Cecilia Muñoz and White House Counsel Neil Eggleston, along with Homeland Security Secretary Jeh Johnson, have been working to chart a plan on executive actions Obama could take, hosting frequent meetings with interest groups and listening to recommendations from immigration advocates, law enforcement officials, religious leaders, Hispanic lawmakers and others, according to The Associated Press.

Advocates and lawmakers who were in separate meetings last week said administration officials are weighing a range of options including reforms to the deportation system and ways to grant relief from deportation to targeted populations in the country, likely by expanding the DACA program.

Proponents of expanding the worker permits would like to see deferred action made available to anyone who would have been eligible for eventual citizenship under a comprehensive immigration bill the Senate passed last year, which would be around 9 million people. House vote

New Mexico delegation praises VA bipartisan bill

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. A3

LENGTH: 294 words

WASHINGTON - A rare bipartisan agreement to reform the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs is being hailed by New Mexico's congressional delegation as a productive plan to fix a scandal-plagued system that has led to shabby and delayed health care for the nation's veterans, including those in New Mexico.

Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, both New Mexico Democrats, hailed the deal.

"This legislation will help veterans who cannot get prompt appointments to obtain care outside the VA system, addresses the shortage of medical staff at many VA facilities ... and funds a $9.5 million lease agreement to continue VA's pharmacy research center in Albuquerque."

Heinrich said, "We should move forward as soon as possible and pass this bipartisan compromise, which addresses the mismanagement and systemic problems at the VA. It's critical that we restore confidence and accountability in the VA health care system and ensure our veterans receive the quality services that they were promised.."

Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., said the VA scandal has spurred rare bipartisan agreement.

"The anger generated by the American people over the treatment of our veterans has spurred Washington to work together to find a solution," Pearce said.

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., has urged Congress to delay its August recess to approve the deal.

"This agreement increases access to much-needed private care, shortening wait times and helping those veterans who live in rural and frontier areas," she said.

Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., said the agreement "takes important steps that can help rebuild the trust of America's veterans by providing key funding to reduce the VA backlog, hire new medical personnel at VA hospitals and clinics, and allow the VA to lease new medical facilities."

LUJAN STATEMENT ON PASSAGE OF VA REFORM LEGISLATION; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 248 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after the passage of the Conference Report for the Veterans' Access to Care through Choice, Accountability, and Transparency Act - legislation to address the serious problems impacting veterans' health care at VA facilities across the country.

"The disturbing reports of misconduct at VA facilities in Albuquerque and across the country are deeply disappointing and strike at the very heart of our commitment to our veterans. This legislation takes important steps that can help rebuild the trust of America's veterans by providing key funding to reduce the VA backlog, hire new medical personnel at VA hospitals and clinics, and allow the VA to lease new medical facilities.

"This legislation will not fix all of the problems plaguing the VA and I would have preferred a bill that includes more funding for our veterans, but it addresses many of the failures that left veterans without timely access to health care, and it is the beginning of what must be an ongoing process to make systematic reforms that honor the sacrifice of the men and women who honorably served our country. It is critical that the Senate also passes this legislation before leaving for the August district work period so we can get it to the President's desk and signed into law."

LUJAN: HOUSE REPUBLICANS TO SUE THE PRESIDENT INSTEAD OF ADDRESSING THE PRIORITIES OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 259 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan released the following statement today after House Republicans moved forward with legislation supporting a lawsuit against the President rather than addressing critical issues facing the country.

"Today House Republicans hit a new low with their frivolous lawsuit against President Obama. Rather than spend time bringing legislation to the floor that grows our economy, spurs job creation, makes college more affordable, or fixes our broken immigration system, House Republicans wasted more time playing politics and attacking President Obama for doing what they have failed to do - act on the pressing issues facing our country.

"The American people want leaders who will work on real solutions to strengthen the middle class and create good jobs in our communities. All House Republicans have to offer is a lawsuit against the President that has been widely criticized by numerous legal scholars. House Democrats have an agenda to strengthen the middle class by providing affordable, quality education; investing in roads and bridges; ensuring equal work for equal pay; and providing incentives to create good jobs right here at home. With only days left before the House begins the August district work period, our focus should be on the priorities of the American people, not a political stunt aimed to appease members of the Tea Party."

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

National Hispanic groups, Asian Americans and Pacific Islanders, as well as labor leaders and faith leaders have announced an unprecedented partnership and initiative of civic participation, beginning with the launch of its' 2014 National Score Card on Immigration. The score card showing how Congress has failed on the issue of immigration reform. (Click here for the Scorecard (http://www.immigrationscores.com/score-cards--vote-descriptions.html))

Republican Congressman Steve Pearce of New Mexico's 2nd Congressional District earned 0% on the Scorecard (http://www.immigrationscores.com/uploads/3/2/0/9/32095163/new_mexico.pdf), while Democratic colleagues Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham (NM-CD1) and Congressman Ben Ray Lujan (NM-CD3) each earned a 91% score. (Click here for the scores (http://www.immigrationscores.com/uploads/3/2/0/9/32095163/new_mexico.pdf).)

"After the 2012 elections, Congress made several promises to enact immigration reform. However, opposition from anti-immigrant extremists turned these into fists hitting pointedly attempts to immigration reform and immigrant families, "said in a statement the 10 EU national leaders, civil rights and faith together Monday. "Congress can try to ignore us and the immigration issue, but we will not."

Amid a national immigration crisis and a shameful lack of leadership in the U.S. Capitol, "Nowhere is anger and disappointment toward Congress is more palpable than in Latino, Asian American and Pacific Islanders communities, and immigrants who suffer daily the consequences of the failure of Congress to remedy the dysfunctional and immoral immigration system" said the advocates of immigration reform.

In response, national leaders have undertaken extensive civic engagement initiative that includes the national distribution of the very first score card on Immigration 2014 showing how Congress failed on issues of immigration reform by refusing to submit to the full House of Representatives a comprehensive draft law, and to appeal to anti-immigrant voting, such as the immediate termination of the DACA program and deportation of dREAMERS. Scores are based on tabulations of votes and actions related to immigration, including the co-sponsorship of bills that include a path to citizenship and family reunification through a visa reform.

The report also shows how the ratings of several members were knocked down by the refusal of leaders to present the full immigration legislation could have been passed in the House of Representatives.

"The National Assessment Card Immigration 2014 leaves no doubt about who supported immigration reform and who worked against us," according to the joint statement. "The American people support immigration reform and join us to send a clear and unambiguous signal to Washington: Congress inaction fuels our action. The time for our communities to be involved is now. "

WASHINGTON, July 27 -- There were 10 key votes in the House this week; the House held a total of 18 roll call votes in the week ending Thursday. There were five key votes in the Senate, which held a total of eight votes. The most important House vote was to pass a bill reauthorizing the Brand USA program for promoting foreign tourism to the U.S. The most important Senate vote was to confirm the nomination of Julie E. Carnes to serve as a judge on the U.S. Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals.

The House also passed the STELA Reauthorization Act (H.R. 4572), sponsored by Rep. Greg Walden, R-Ore., to extend through 2019 expiring provisions relating to the retransmission of signals of television broadcast stations; passed the NIST Reauthorization Act (H.R. 5035), sponsored by Rep. Larry Bucshon, R-Ind., to reauthorize the National Institute of Standards and Technology; passed the Gerardo Hernandez Airport Security Act (H.R. 4802), sponsored by Rep. Richard Hudson, R-N.C., to improve intergovernmental planning for and communication during security incidents at domestic airports; and passed the Honor Flight Act (H.R. 4812), sponsored by Rep. Cedric L. Richmond, D-La., to require the Transportation Security Administration (TSA) to establish a process for providing expedited and dignified passenger screening services for veterans traveling to visit war memorials built and dedicated to honor their service.

Here's a look at how area members of Congress voted over the previous week.

HOUSE VOTES:

House Vote 1:

PROMOTING FOREIGN TRAVEL TO THE U.S.: The House has passed the Travel Promotion, Enhancement, and Modernization Act (H.R. 4450), sponsored by Rep. Gus M. Bilirakis, R-Fla. The bill would reauthorize through 2020 the Brand USA program, a public-private partnership that promotes foreign travel to the U.S., and introduce a variety of measures to increase oversight of Brand USA. Bilirakis said Brand USA required no funding from the federal government and increased the number of international visitors to the U.S. by 1.1 million in fiscal 2013, generating $3.4 billion of economic activity and associated job creation. The vote, on July 22, was 347 yeas to 57 nays.

House Vote 2:

SANCTIONS AGAINST HEZBOLLAH: The House has passed the Hezbollah International Financing Prevention Act (H.R. 4411), sponsored by Rep. Mark Meadows, R-N.C. The bill would impose sanctions on financial institutions that conduct business for Hezbollah and on groups that support the operation of Hezbollah's al-Manar TV network, and designate Hezbollah as a significant foreign narcotics trafficker. Meadows said the sanctions were needed to make sure that Congress does what it can to cripple Hezbollah's ability to finance terrorism operations that endanger Israel, America, and other nations. The vote, on July 22, was unanimous with 404 yeas.

House Vote 3:

RESEARCHING ENERGY CRITICAL ELEMENTS: The House has rejected the Securing Energy Critical Elements and American Jobs Act (H.R. 1022), sponsored by Rep. Eric Swalwell, D-Calif. The bill would have authorized the Energy Department to create a research and development program for rare earth elements and other elements critical to energy-related technologies, communications technologies, and weapons systems, as well as the creation of a Critical Materials Energy Innovation Hub for collaborating on research into energy critical elements. Swalwell said the elements, despite being in limited supply, are vital to a range of new energy technologies, including solar and wind power, but China dominates the supply of rare earth elements, and the bill was needed to help "ensure that the United States maintains a sufficient, reliable supply of energy critical elements." No opponents of the bill spoke on the House floor. The vote, on July 22, was 260 yeas to 143 nays, with a two-thirds majority required for approval.

House Vote 4:

DUAL ENROLLMENT AND COMPETENCY-BASED EDUCATION: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Trey Gowdy, R-S.C., to the Advancing Competency-Based Education Demonstration Project Act (H.R. 3136). The amendment would allow students in dual enrollment programs to be included in demonstration projects for competency-based education. Gowdy said high school students who are attending college classes deserve to take part in the projects to help achieve their goal of getting college credit and reducing their higher education costs while still in high school. The vote, on July 23, was unanimous with 413 yeas.

House Vote 5:

COMPETENCY-BASED EDUCATION: The House has passed the Advancing Competency-Based Education Demonstration Project Act (H.R. 3136), sponsored by Rep. Matt Salmon, R-Ariz. The bill would direct the Education Secretary to choose colleges and universities to voluntarily participate in programs to demonstrate competency-based education, which assesses and measures student learning instead of, or in addition to, measuring students' credit or clock hours. Salmon said the programs could cut higher education costs for students, especially older students, by giving them credit for the skills they have received before going to college, and incentivize them "to work hard to accelerate their degree attainment, potentially cutting their overall education costs and allowing them to begin their careers sooner." The vote, on July 23, was unanimous with 414 yeas.

House Vote 6:

FINANCIAL EDUCATION FOR STUDENTS: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Derek Kilmer, D-Wash., to the Empowering Students Through Enhanced Financial Counseling Act (H.R. 4984). The amendment would require that student loan recipients be introduced to the financial management resources provided by the Treasury Department's Financial Literacy and Education Commission. Kilmer said the commission, which was established in 2003, can offer students guidance on how to "responsibly manage their finances" and avoid problems created by having too much debt, without the ability to repay their student loans. The vote, on July 24, was 404 yeas to 14 nays.

House Vote 7:

STUDENT LOAN COUNSELING: The House has passed the Empowering Students Through Enhanced Financial Counseling Act (H.R. 4984), sponsored by Rep. Brett Guthrie, R-Ky. The bill would require colleges and universities to annually provide counseling about Pell Grants to grant recipients and about the cost of student loans to students borrowing money under the William D. Ford Federal Direct Loan program. Guthrie said information provided to students under the bill would empower students by ensuring that they understand the terms of their loans, their financial options for managing and repaying their loans, and the longer-term impact of having to repay their loans. The vote, on July 24, was 405 yeas to 11 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 8:

CHILD SEX TRAFFICKING: The House has passed a bill (H.R. 5111), sponsored by Rep. Joyce Beatty, D-Ohio, to replace the term "child prostitution" with "child sex trafficking" in the list of categories for reporting child sexual exploitation to the CyberTipline for receiving leads and tips regarding suspected crimes of sexual exploitation. Beatty said the change of terms would help ensure that victims of child sex trafficking are considered victims rather than criminals and "continue to fight the perception that sex trafficking is a voluntary, victimless crime." The vote, on July 24, was unanimous with 409 yeas.

House Vote 9:

TAX INCENTIVES FOR HIGHER EDUCATION: The House has passed the Student and Family Tax Simplification Act (H.R. 3393), sponsored by Rep. Diane Black, R-Tenn. The bill would amend the tax code to establish an American Opportunity Tax Credit that awards an up to $2,000 tax credit for higher education tuition and related expenses to students, while eliminating four current tax incentives for higher education. Black said that by consolidating the tax incentives into a single tax credit, the bill would make it easier for students to receive help paying for their education by simplifying the tax code. A bill opponent, Rep. Sander M. Levin, D-Mich., said the consolidated credit would harm a variety of students by removing the lifetime learning tax credit and limiting the tax incentive for higher education to the first four years a student is enrolled. The vote, on July 24, was 227 yeas to 187 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 10:

NEGOTIATING VERSIONS OF VA REFORM BILL: The House has rejected a motion sponsored by Rep. Scott H. Peters, D-Calif., to instruct House conferees with the Senate on negotiating differences between the two chambers' conflicting versions of the Veteran Access to Care Act (H.R. 3230). The motion would have instructed the conferees to agree to the Senate's version of the bill. Peters said the Senate's plan for reforming the Veterans Affairs Department to address problems with a lack of medical care for veterans was superior to the House plan because it provided $17.6 billion needed for the VA to "lease more facilities, hire doctors and nurses to fill their most pressing staff shortages," and allow veterans to go outside the VA to receive care. A motion opponent, Rep. Jeff Miller, R-Fla., said the VA has not justified its request for $17.6 billion, especially given its track record of wasting budgeted funds. The vote to instruct conferees, on July 24, was 205 yeas to 207 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

SENATE VOTES:

Senate Vote 1:

CONFIRMING APPEALS COURT JUDGE: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Julie E. Carnes to serve as a judge on the U.S. Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals. A supporter, Sen. Johnny Isakson, R-Ga., cited Carnes' 22 years of service as a judge on the U.S. District Court for the Northern District of Georgia, preceded by more than 10 years of work as an assistant U.S. attorney. Isakson said Carnes has "immense capacity, outstanding integrity, and outstanding ability" and those assets would strengthen the appeals court. The vote, on July 21, was unanimous with 94 yeas.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 2:

CALIFORNIA DISTRICT JUDGE: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Andre Birotte Jr. to serve as a U.S. District Judge for the Central District of California. A supporter, Sen. Dianne Feinstein, D-Calif., praised Birotte's performance as U.S. attorney for the district the past four years, and previous service as an assistant U.S. attorney in the district and inspector general for the Los Angeles Police Commission. Feinstein said that throughout his career, Birotte "has built a reputation for fairness and for a profound commitment to the rule of law. He has earned the deep respect of people on all sides of difficult issues." The vote, on July 22, was unanimous with 100 yeas.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 3:

FLORIDA DISTRICT JUDGE: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Robin L. Rosenberg to serve as a U.S. District Judge for the Southern District of Florida. A supporter, Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla., cited Rosenberg's 25 years of experience in the law, including the last seven years as a judge on Florida's Fifteenth Judicial Circuit and, previously, as a private lawyer, attorney for the Justice Department and city of West Palm Beach, and law clerk in the Southern District of Florida. Nelson added that Rosenberg received a unanimously qualified rating from the American Bar Association. The vote, on July 22, was unanimous with 100 yeas.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 4:

TAX CREDIT FOR MOVING BUSINESSES TO AMERICA: The Senate has agreed to a motion to end debate on the motion to consider the Bring Jobs Home Act (S. 2569), sponsored by Sen. John E. Walsh, D-Mont. The bill would amend the tax code to offer businesses an up to 20 percent tax credit for expenses incurred from transferring a business from outside the U.S. to inside the U.S., while also denying a tax deduction for expenses incurred from transferring a business from inside the U.S. to outside the U.S. Walsh said: "There are companies out there right now that are considering bringing business activities back to the United States. We must do everything we possibly can to help those companies create jobs and grow our American economy right here at home." The vote, on July 23, was 93 yeas to 7 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 5:

DEBATING APPEALS COURT NOMINEE: The Senate has approved a motion to end debate on the nomination of Pamela Harris to serve as a judge on the U.S. Fourth Circuit Court of Appeals. A supporter of ending debate, Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, D-Vt., cited Harris' experience as a law professor, private lawyer, Justice Department official, and law clerk to appeals court and Supreme Court judges. Leahy called Harris "a highly accomplished lawyer with excellent legal credentials." An opponent of ending debate, Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, questioned whether Harris would depend on the Constitution and the law in making impartial rulings as an appeals judge, rather than seek to advance a liberal agenda. The vote, on July 24, was 54 yeas to 41 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Luján bid to improve broadcasting moves ahead

BYLINE: Gary Gerew

LENGTH: 292 words

An amendment proposed by Rep. Ben Ray Luján (D-3) to expand television markets was included in a bill reauthorizing the satellite television law.

Luján said his amendment proposes to create new broadcasting markets based on current and future technologies instead of the limitations of broadcasting antennas.

"Despite new technological innovations, television viewers remain limited to broadcasts that are intended for their designated market areas based upon maps that were drawn decades ago," Luján said in a statement. "As traditional services such as over-the-air broadcast, cable, and satellite companies have been joined by new alternatives such as over-the-top content, Internet Protocol television, and other services, it is time to revisit DMAs so that Nielsen's maps of almost obsolete antenna networks no longer block consumers from accessing programing from outside their DMA."

The bill was passed by the House on Tuesday.

"With a broadband connection, viewers can watch an almost infinite amount of on-demand video online. With a smartphone, tablet, or other mobile device, they can watch this content from a wi-fi hotspot or virtually anywhere with wireless service. Through the internet, consumers can listen to radio signals from around the globe," Luján said in a statement. "But under this antiquated system governing the boundaries of a DMA, viewers in Clovis, Portales, or Tucumcari cannot watch TV broadcast from New Mexico. It's time to examine how we can improve this outdated system."

LUJAN TAKES TO HOUSE FLOOR TO DISCUSSES HUMANITARIAN CRISIS AT THE BORDER AND HUMAN TRAFFICKING; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 682 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District spoke on the House floor yesterday evening during debate on a number of bills aimed at combating human and sex trafficking. Lujan highlighted the importance of protecting children from violence and the need to do the same for children who are fleeing extreme violence in Central America. Below are Lujan's remarks.

"I rise today in support of this legislation and many other bills we are considering that deal with human and sex trafficking - an important issue, a critical issue - especially as it relates to protecting children who are too often victims of abuse and violence, and I commend the Speaker for bringing these bills up for a vote.

"Mr. Speaker, as I was watching the debate this evening I couldn't help but come back to the floor. I hope all of my colleagues that are speaking tonight on the importance of passing these human trafficking bills will join us next week to talk about the importance of protecting children. It was with alarm, Mr. Speaker, that I read a letter that Speaker Boehner penned to President Barack Obama - that appears that my Republican colleagues when they left the meeting earlier this afternoon, are asking to take away the very protections from children [from] a law that was passed in 2008 - [yet they] are asking to protect these children tonight.

"So I come today to ask my colleagues to read the transcripts, to hear the debate this evening, and to think about it - to go home this weekend and whatever faith that we may be, that we pray about it and we talk to our pastors and our religious leaders about it. Because these kids that we are going to be talking about next week are the very children that need protections as well.

"The motivation to pass these bills today is the same motivation that moved this body to pass legislation that became law in 2008 - to protect children. This law has since become the subject of much condemnation from many of my Republican colleagues as we discuss the humanitarian crisis on the border.

"We are here on this floor debating legislation to protect children, yet many of my colleagues want to take away due process from children who are trying to escape unimaginable violence in Central America. In Honduras, the murder capital of the world, the violence was captured in a story recently, and I apologize for the graphic nature of this story.

"The story that was reported on - 'during a recent late-night visit to the San Pedro Sula morgue, more than 60 bodies, all victims of violence, were seen piled in a heap, each wrapped in a brown plastic bag. While picking bullets out of a 15-year-old boy shot 15 times, technicians discussed how they regularly received corpses of children under 10, and sometimes as young as 2. Last week, in nearby Santa Barbara, an 11-year-old had his throat slit by other children, because he did not pay a 50-cent extortion fee.'

"The doctor at the morgue said, before we saw children being killed because they were at the scene when gangs were coming to prey on families and they just happened to be there. Now we're seeing kids kill kids. There are hundreds of other stories like this, of which I will ask to submit into the record with extraneous materials, but Mr. Speaker, I beg and I plead of my colleagues - each and every one of us that may or may not have been here when the law was passed, but those of us who are here now - these are kids. And I know that you and I, Mr. Speaker, that we love children and we want to make sure they are not victims of these horrific crimes.

"Please, please take this weekend and ask the Speaker [Boehner] to remove the provisions that would take away the due process from these children. And as we pass these bills together, let us not forget what brought this Congress together in 2008 to protect these children. Let us show the same compassion that is the driving force of these bills tonight."

DATELINE: WINDOW ROCK

WINDOW ROCK -- The 22nd Navajo Nation Council wrapped up its Summer Session Wednesday after tabling a number of resolutions, including the Fort Wingate Land Division Act of 2014.

Delegate Danny Simpson said the Fort Wingate Task Force had done a tremendous amount of work with help from the Eastern Navajo Land Commission.

"Congressman Stephen Pearce had a legislation in place to divide that land 50-50. We started working with the Fort Wingate Task Force and Eastern Land Commission to address this issue. Some of the members from Eastern Land Commission made a trip to meet with Congressman (Ben Ray) Lujan to stop this bill that Congressman Pearce was sponsoring.

"During that meeting we asked Congressman Luján to say we would like to get 100 percent of the land at Fort Wingate -- 'No, we don't want the one that is contaminated, we want the good land, 100 percent.'"

Luján told them there was no way they could get a deal passed giving 100 percent of Fort Wingate to the Navajo Nation, that there had to be a compromise, Simpson said.

50-50 split?

Larry Rodgers of Eastern Navajo Land Commission, said the efforts of the Land Commission came into play when it seemed they were going to be behind the eight-ball when the bill went to Congress. "As Mr. Simpson indicated, Mr. Pearce introduced a bill that would give 4,500 acres of Parcel 1 all to Zuni, and two little parcels to the Navajo Nation, Parcel 15 and 17. Altogether, 25 parcels make up the military reservation," he said.

Navajo and Zuni began negotiations in late 2012, meeting first at Zuni. "Two essential questions came about right away. The Zuni question was, 'Will Navajo negotiate with us on a 50 to 50 basis?'" Rodgers said Speaker Johnny Naize told them no.

"The Navajo question to Zuni was, 'If you want to negotiate, can you ask Pearce to withdraw his bill?' Zuni said no. And that was it. The talks ended right here. The Zuni then asked the Navajo delegation to stay for lunch and that was it. We were out of there," Rodgers said.

New parameters

In the summer of 2013 both tribes were asked to come to Washington to negotiate, and to bring their plans with them. Rodgers said Zuni brought a plan that was practically half and half. Navajo structured a map that would have given Navajo about 60 percent and Zuni about 30 percent, with the remaining 10 percent to be maintained by the military

"Of course, with that type of wide division, the differences between the two, the first talks in D.C. did not pan out either and the facilitators, Mr. Pearce and also Mr. Lujan, instructed the tribes to go back and find a neutral place to continue negotiations, which never occurred," Rodgers said.

A year went by and they received another letter from the congressmen, setting down some parameters for the tribes for final negotiations.

"One was that both tribes would have access to I-40, that the lands not be checker-boarded, and that the acreage be about as equitable as possible," Rodgers said. They met July 8, 2013, in Washington with Pearce as the main facilitator. "He wanted to go parcel by parcel. For those parcels that we were pretty much in agreement with, we didn't necessarily discuss those. It was kind of automatically given. For those areas that we had disagreement and overlap, those were strongly discussed."

Parcel 1, in the southern area, is the higher terrain of the military reservation. "All of that, the Zuni wanted," Rodgers said, but Baahaali Chapter wanted to make sure that it was able to get something out of the land settlement. Their piece, as recommended, was carved out of Parcel 1 because it was closest and adjacent to their chapter.

In the northern tier, he said, they were able to get more than half of Parcel 10A adjacent to Sundance for Churchrock Chapter. "We strongly believe that Sundance, first of all, needs to be expanded. It's been a growing community for a very long time. So we argued that they would need to have access to that adjacent land."

Navajo prevails

Rodgers said they went on and on in terms of agreeing and disagreeing on certain areas, but they could never agree on Parcel 1. "At the end of the day, the three congressmen said, 'We will decide how to divide up Parcel 1 and we will let you know."

On their way to the airport, Rodgers said he and Simpson got texts from the Navajo Nation Washington Office that the land division in Parcel 1 had gone in their favor, and that they had even picked up additional acreage there.

"Mainly, I think, it's because of the reverency we have as Navajos. When Mr. Naize was asked, 'Would you allow Zuni to access traditional land areas for shrine visit purposes and so forth, and he says, 'Sure, we do it with Hopi.' And Zuni was asked, 'Would you allow Navajos to enter your part?' and they said no. So I think that in itself was the determination of why the three congressmen decided to give a larger piece in Parcel 1 to Navajo than we had bargained for," Rodgers said.

Delegate Edmund Yazzie asked his colleagues to table the resolution for two weeks, until after they talk with congressional leaders on Tuesday to see whether they can negotiate further with the Zuni Tribe.

"There are records that's been shown ... studies, historically, that this land belongs to the Navajo Nation. Code talkers have signed in there at Fort Wingate. There's a letter by President Roosevelt that indicates an executive order in 1907 saying that this land does belong to Navajo. That's why this legislation is very hard. We cannot vote on this. We need to work this out. We can't jump to this. I am pleading with you for the people that speak within our chapters," Yazzie said.

The tabling motion passed 12-9.

LUJAN TAKES TO HOUSE FLOOR TO DISCUSSES HUMANITARIAN CRISIS AT THE BORDER AND HUMAN TRAFFICKING

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 666 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District spoke on the House floor yesterday evening during debate on a number of bills aimed at combating human and sex trafficking. Lujan highlighted the importance of protecting children from violence and the need to do the same for children who are fleeing extreme violence in Central America. Below are Lujan's remarks.

"I rise today in support of this legislation and many other bills we are considering that deal with human and sex trafficking - an important issue, a critical issue - especially as it relates to protecting children who are too often victims of abuse and violence, and I commend the Speaker for bringing these bills up for a vote.

"Mr. Speaker, as I was watching the debate this evening I couldn't help but come back to the floor. I hope all of my colleagues that are speaking tonight on the importance of passing these human trafficking bills will join us next week to talk about the importance of protecting children. It was with alarm, Mr. Speaker, that I read a letter that Speaker Boehner penned to President Barack Obama - that appears that my Republican colleagues when they left the meeting earlier this afternoon, are asking to take away the very protections from children [from] a law that was passed in 2008 - [yet they] are asking to protect these children tonight.

"So I come today to ask my colleagues to read the transcripts, to hear the debate this evening, and to think about it - to go home this weekend and whatever faith that we may be, that we pray about it and we talk to our pastors and our religious leaders about it. Because these kids that we are going to be talking about next week are the very children that need protections as well.

"The motivation to pass these bills today is the same motivation that moved this body to pass legislation that became law in 2008 - to protect children. This law has since become the subject of much condemnation from many of my Republican colleagues as we discuss the humanitarian crisis on the border.

"We are here on this floor debating legislation to protect children, yet many of my colleagues want to take away due process from children who are trying to escape unimaginable violence in Central America. In Honduras, the murder capital of the world, the violence was captured in a story recently, and I apologize for the graphic nature of this story.

"The story that was reported on - "during a recent late-night visit to the San Pedro Sula morgue, more than 60 bodies, all victims of violence, were seen piled in a heap, each wrapped in a brown plastic bag. While picking bullets out of a 15-year-old boy shot 15 times, technicians discussed how they regularly received corpses of children under 10, and sometimes as young as 2. Last week, in nearby Santa Barbara, an 11-year-old had his throat slit by other children, because he did not pay a 50-cent extortion fee.'

"The doctor at the morgue said, before we saw children being killed because they were at the scene when gangs were coming to prey on families and they just happened to be there. Now we're seeing kids kill kids. There are hundreds of other stories like this, of which I will ask to submit into the record with extraneous materials, but Mr. Speaker, I beg and I plead of my colleagues - each and every one of us that may or may not have been here when the law was passed, but those of us who are here now - these are kids. And I know that you and I, Mr. Speaker, that we love children and we want to make sure they are not victims of these horrific crimes.

"Please, please take this weekend and ask the Speaker [Boehner] to remove the provisions that would take away the due process from these children. And as we pass these bills together, let us not forget what brought this Congress together in 2008 to protect these children. Let us show the same compassion that is the driving force of these bills tonight."

Lujan Introduces Legislation to Promote Renewable Energy and Energy Efficiency

LENGTH: 369 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District introduced legislation recently that will promote energy savings through increased efficiency standards and increased investments in renewable energy, such as wind, solar, geothermal, hydro, and biomass. The American Renewable Energy and Efficiency Act, introduced by Luján and Rep. Peter Welch of Vermont - both members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, enacts a national renewable energy standard to reduce carbon emissions and drive clean energy deployment in states around the country.

"Promoting the use of renewable energy and increased energy efficiency is not only good for our environment, but it is good for our economy and for consumers," Luján said. "A renewable energy standard will drive the development of the clean energy sector, creating good jobs in communities across the country, especially New Mexico where we are home to abundant renewable resources. A greater emphasis on energy efficiency will also lower energy bills and put more money back in the pockets of hard-working families."

"The United States is lagging behind on energy efficiency and in adopting renewables. Our nation's energy policies are overdue for a rewrite," said Welch. "Our legislation charts a new energy future where energy efficiency and renewable technologies are put to work creating jobs, saving money and improving the environment."

The legislation requires electric utilities to obtain a minimum of 25 percent of their electricity from renewable sources by 2025. Electric and natural gas utilities will also need to implement energy efficiency programs in order to save the equivalent of 15 percent and 10 percent of sales respectively by 2025.

An analysis of the American Renewable Energy Efficiency Act and similar legislation found the bill would create more than 400,000 jobs, save the average household $39 annually in energy, and reduce carbon emissions by 480 million metric tons by 2025. Companion legislation has been introduced in the Senate by Ed Markey of Massachusetts.

Lujan Visits Albuquerque VA Facility, Meets with Acting VA Secretary

LENGTH: 311 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after visiting the Raymond G. Murphy VA Medical Center in Albuquerque and meeting with Acting Secretary of the VA Sloan Gibson.

"The Albuquerque VA has experienced serious problems that have significantly impacted the quality and scheduling of care that New Mexico's veterans have received. This mismanagement strikes at the very heart of our commitment to our veterans and must be fixed quickly and thoroughly. Secretary Gibson's visit today provided an important opportunity to convey what New Mexico's veterans have experienced - from unacceptable wait times to care that fails to live up to our commitment.

"I expressed the importance of accountability and transparency at the Albuquerque VA, so that we can take the necessary steps to provide health care that is worthy of the service of these brave men and women. Secretary Gibson assured us that, as members of Congress, we would receive information from the New Mexico VA that is critical to perform our oversight responsibility, and ensuring our veterans receive the care they deserve. It is also essential that whistleblowers who step forward with concerns regarding the treatment of veterans are listened to, and not intimidated and discouraged from speaking up. A culture of intimidation must change, and we need leadership that will embrace those who share their concerns rather than trying to hide or ignore them.

"Finally, I highlighted for the Secretary the importance of seeing that our veterans in rural areas across New Mexico have access to high quality care and the need to address the challenges that are unique to these communities."

LUJAN AMENDMENT TO EXAMINE NEW BROADCASTING MARKETS PASSES HOUSE

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 481 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District highlighted the passage of legislation today that included an amendment he offered as part of the Satellite Television Extension and Localism Act (STELA) reauthorization. Lujan's amendment explores how new broadcasting markets could be created if they are based upon the potential of current and future technologies instead of the limitations of aging broadcasting antennas. The STELA bill reauthorizes the nation's satellite television law, ensuring that 1.5 million subscribers in hard-to-reach areas continue to receive broadcast programming.

Currently, television viewers are limited to broadcasts that are intended for their designated market areas (DMA). The FCC has delegated the role of defining these DMAs to the Nielsen Company, a privately-held for-profit marketing research company. Nielsen has divided up the country into separate DMAs based upon the reach of a television station's antiquated broadcast antennas. These antennas, which were considered cutting-edge technology back in the 1950's, are now relied upon by less than 10 percent of viewers, but continue to determine the broadcast stations available at any given location in the country.

"Despite new technological innovations, television viewers remain limited to broadcasts that are intended for their designated market areas based upon maps that were drawn decades ago," Congressman Lujan said. "As traditional services such as over-the-air broadcast, cable, and satellite companies have been joined by new alternatives such as over-the-top content, Internet Protocol television, and other services, it is time to revisit DMAs so that Nielsen's maps of almost obsolete antenna networks no longer block consumers from accessing programing from outside their DMA."

Lujan's amendment allows the FCC to embrace and explore the possibilities of cutting-edge technologies and their impact on broadcasting by building on a study of DMAs commissioned by the last STELA bill in 2010. It requires the FCC to update its earlier study and explore how new broadcasting markets could be created if they are based upon the potential of current and future technologies instead of the limitations of aging broadcast antennas.

"With a broadband connection, viewers can watch an almost infinite amount of on-demand video online. With a smartphone, tablet, or other mobile device, they can watch this content from a wi-fi hotspot or virtually anywhere with wireless service. Through the internet, consumers can listen to radio signals from around the globe," Lujan added. "But under this antiquated system governing the boundaries of a DMA, viewers in Clovis, Portales, or Tucumcari cannot watch TV broadcasted from New Mexico. It's time to examine how we can improve this outdated system."

SECTION: FRONT PAGE; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 1922 words

WASHINGTON - As thousands of Central American children stream northward toward the U.S. border, lawmakers in Washington - including New Mexico's congressional delegation - are grappling with how to respond.

In Journal interviews last week, all five members of New Mexico's congressional delegation suggested they would likely support some sort of emergency spending bill to deal with the crisis, but each also said Congress must enact longer-term legislative solutions.

Many of the recent border arrivals, including some children as young as five, are fleeing widespread poverty and gang violence in Honduras, Guatemala and El Salvador. The U.S. government is scrambling to counter perceptions in Central America that refugees would be welcomed with open arms at the U.S. border - a mistaken view that has proliferated since a 2012 policy change by the White House that allowed children already in the country illegally to stay and gain perma- nent residency cards.

More than 52,000 unaccompanied minors, as well as 39,000 adults with children, have been apprehended trying to cross the U.S.-Mexico border since October, according to the White House.

The delegation's remarks to the Journal on the crisis last week came as nearly 40 Honduran children and adults, who had been detained in the Federal Law Enforcement Training Center in Artesia, boarded a government airplane in Roswell for deportation last Monday. The Artesia facility is one of many makeshift detention centers used to house the illegal immigrants in states along the U.S.-Mexico border.

"On a gut level, it's hard because I'm sure that most of them went back to very difficult conditions," said Sen. Martin Heinrich, a Democrat. "However, we're a nation of laws and there is a process. You don't get to go to the front of the line because of economic reasons. If you have a credible asylum case, that's a different story and we need to treat those folks who qualify for asylum differently."

Last week, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid tapped Heinrich to help shape Senate Democrats' messaging on the crisis. On Wednesday, the New Mexico lawmaker went to the Senate floor to make a speech challenging some Republicans' insistence that the influx of illegal immigrant children is a result of lax border enforcement.

"The reality is, what's driving children to our borders is unimaginable violence, corruption, extreme poverty and instability in their home countries," Heinrich said in his speech, adding that increased manpower and technology has made the U.S. border more secure than ever. "The exodus in Honduras, El Salvador and Guatemala is about children fleeing for their lives."

Rep. Steve Pearce, the lone Republican in New Mexico's five-person congressional delegation, maintains that most of the immigrants entering the U.S. illegally from Central America are fleeing because of poverty and not violence.

Pearce is serving on a newly created Republican House task force created to recommend a set of policy prescriptions for the border crisis. He and other members of the task force traveled to Honduras and Guatemala this month to assess the reasons for the migrant exodus. The group met with the presidents of both countries but otherwise rarely ventured from their hotel for safety reasons.

"They were saying, 'Send us our kids back,' " Pearce said, adding that the July 14 deportation flight from his district in New Mexico sent an important signal to people planning to enter the country illegally.

"The president and (Homeland Security Secretary) Jeh Johnson have said they will enforce the law and enforce it vigorously. This indicated to me the administration is really going through with it."

Pearce also said the deportation flight sent a message to Artesia residents, some of whom are apprehensive about the tide of Central American immigrants arriving in their community.

"They are asking, 'What about the schools?' " Pearce said. "I'm telling people that Artesia is the site where the administration is trying to follow the law very scrupulously. People will be cycling though there, but it's not like they will be building up and living in the community for decades."

On Wednesday, Rep. Ben Ray Luján, a Democrat, met with President Barack Obama at the White House, along with other members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus. During the meeting, Luján made an emotional plea, urging the president to act with compassion toward the new arrivals.

Luján recounted a story he had read about two nuns working with immigrant children at Catholic Charities in Honduras. He said the nuns reported that one child's parents tried to prevent his recruitment by a local gang, only to see the child murdered by the gang, who then killed the parents, as well.

"We have a responsibility to these children," Luján said in a Journal interview before the White House meeting. "We can't lose sight that this is a humanitarian crisis. It's been said a lot, but sadly I don't know that everyone understands what is happening to these kids and what they are fleeing.

"These are kids - 7, 8, 9 years old, and some as young as 5," Luján said, while rebuking fellow lawmakers calling for swift deportations. "I never realized that so many of my colleagues thought so poorly of kids around the world that are so desperate for help. I never thought I would see this day. It's not how I was raised and it's not how I was taught in my church."

However, the congressman stopped short of calling for blanket amnesty for children arriving at the U.S. border from Central America.

Speedy deportation

Luján and other New Mexico delegation Democrats said they are unlikely to support a new bipartisan proposal by Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, and Rep. Henry Cuellar, D-Texas, that would speed deportations.

The bill aims to change the 2008 William Wilberforce Trafficking Victims Protection Action Act to give Border Patrol agents greater authority to screen and deport Central American children.

Currently, the law allows for rapid deportation of children arriving at the U.S. border from Mexico, but not Central America. The Cornyn-Cuellar bill would treat all children the same under the law by allowing them to file a legal claim with an immigration court within a week of being screened by Department of Health and Human Services officials. A judge would have 72 hours to rule on whether the child is eligible to stay in the U.S. If not, the child would be returned to his or her home country.

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, another New Mexico Democrat, said merely expediting deportations does not address the root problem of the thousands of Central American kids trying to get into the U.S.

"I appreciate that there is an immediate effort to do something about the crisis," Lujan Grisham said. "I'm not in agreement that minimizing the due process requirement in the law gives you a better outcome. It doesn't solve the problem, which is why you need more thoughtful proposals. I worry that that's not the way this country ought to be treating unaccompanied minors who have found their way into this country."

Pearce said he is unsure if he would support the Cornyn-Cuellar bill in its entirety, but he does support amending the William Wiberforce Act to expedite the return of immigrants to their home countries.

"Changing the 2008 law absolutely must be done," Pearce said.

He also said the system is already working as it should with respect to asylum proposals.

"Everyone who says they came from violence is listened to," Pearce said. "The hearing process will ensure we don't send people back into violent situations. That is handled by the Justice Department. It's not a matter of legislation. It's already in law, and I trust that law is working quite well."

Obama proposal

Earlier this month, President Barack Obama sent Congress a request for a $3.7 billion supplemental appropriation to help deal with the surge of immigrants. The request includes money for extra judges and lawyers to help process immigration cases, as well as additional funds to pay for housing and feeding the new arrivals until they are returned to their countries or granted asylum in the U.S.

Most Democrats in New Mexico's congressional delegation were reluctant to express outright support for the president's request, saying they were still evaluating it and needed more details. But all the Democrats, and Pearce, suggested some kind of supplemental appropriation would be needed.

"It's a huge amount of money," Pearce said. "The main thing is that the president didn't commit any kind of working plan. Show us how you're going to fix the problem. If the money needs to be appropriated, fine. The question is what is it doing, how much efficiency and effectiveness are you doing it with?"

Heinrich expressed reservations about the Cornyn-Cuellar approach, but voiced clear support for the president's budget request.

"It should go through the appropriations process and we should go through each piece of it to make sure it is the appropriate response," Heinrich said. "But I think that making sure we have the resources to process people expeditiously is absolutely appropriate."

Reminded that the price tag on the president's bill approaches $4 billion, Heinrich suggested it is money that must be spent.

"We're going to need to face the facts as they are, not as we would like them to be," he said.

Sen. Tom Udall, also a Democrat, declined to take a position on the president's budget request or the Cornyn-Cuellar bill. He suggested the best solution is contained in a comprehensive immigration reform bill approved by the Senate last year.

"We can talk about all of the proposals we want, but we need to address this situation in a comprehensive way," Udall said, a sentiment echoed by every other Democrat in the delegation. "I think the solution is pretty clear - we need comprehensive immigration reform that secures our borders and clearly defines our laws."

Udall pointed out that a so-called "path to citizenship" provision in the Senate immigration bill that would prevent otherwise law-abiding people who are in the country illegally from being deported applies only to those who were in the U.S. prior to the Dec. 31, 2011. That means the most recent arrivals would still be turned away if the Senate bill was enacted.

"Since these young people are very recent, they would not be eligible," Udall said.

Udall and other New Mexico lawmakers contend the Senate bill would establish clear new rules for who can obtain legal status in America, which would send a message to would-be immigrants. But Sen. Marco Rubio, a Florida Republican who helped author the bill, disagreed.

"I don't think the immigration bill that was proposed in the Senate would have prevented that from happening," Rubio recently told The Washington Times. "What I think would have prevented that from happening is sufficient border security on the ground that would have discouraged people from making that journey in the first place."

Republican leaders in the House have refused to debate the Senate-passed bill, but Udall said the current border crisis could prompt them to reconsider. Some observers - including Luján - contend there are enough votes in the House to pass the Senate bill if House Speaker John Boehner would bring it to a vote.

"When we're in the middle of crisis, people can change their minds," Udall said. "This bill sends a very strong statement about what we want the laws to be. The ball is in the court of the House. We dealt with it."

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District introduced legislation recently that will promote energy savings through increased efficiency standards and increased investments in renewable energy, such as wind, solar, geothermal, hydro, and biomass. The American Renewable Energy and Efficiency Act, introduced by Lujan and Rep. Peter Welch of Vermont - both members of the House Energy and Commerce Committee, enacts a national renewable energy standard to reduce carbon emissions and drive clean energy deployment in states around the country.

"Promoting the use of renewable energy and increased energy efficiency is not only good for our environment, but it is good for our economy and for consumers," Lujan said. "A renewable energy standard will drive the development of the clean energy sector, creating good jobs in communities across the country, especially New Mexico where we are home to abundant renewable resources. A greater emphasis on energy efficiency will also lower energy bills and put more money back in the pockets of hard-working families."

"The United States is lagging behind on energy efficiency and in adopting renewables. Our nation's energy policies are overdue for a rewrite," said Welch. "Our legislation charts a new energy future where energy efficiency and renewable technologies are put to work creating jobs, saving money and improving the environment."

The legislation requires electric utilities to obtain a minimum of 25 percent of their electricity from renewable sources by 2025. Electric and natural gas utilities will also need to implement energy efficiency programs in order to save the equivalent of 15 percent and 10 percent of sales respectively by 2025.

An analysis of the American Renewable Energy Efficiency Act and similar legislation found the bill would create more than 400,000 jobs, save the average household $39 annually in energy, and reduce carbon emissions by 480 million metric tons by 2025. Companion legislation has been introduced in the Senate by Ed Markey of Massachusetts.

As a member of the Public Regulatory Commission before coming to Congress, Lujan worked with his colleagues to develop a renewable portfolio standard to increase renewable energy production by New Mexico utilities and to diversity utilities' renewable portfolios to include solar energy.

State may lose in Internet tax fight; Revenue would fall, but users get break

BYLINE: DAN BOYD JOURNAL CAPITOL BUREAU

SECTION: METRO & NEW MEXICO; Pg. C1

LENGTH: 477 words

SANTA FE - A bill making its way through Congress could cost New Mexico state government - and cities and counties statewide - roughly $44 million in annual tax revenue, according to a report from a nonpartisan national think tank.

On the flip side, it would also mean a tax break for thousands of New Mexico residents and businesses by eliminating a monthly tax on Internet access.

New Mexico is one of seven states that levy a tax on Internet access, according to the Washington D.C.-based Center on Budget and Policy Priorities.

Unlike the sales tax model used by many states that taxes only goods, New Mexico has a gross receipts tax that is imposed on most goods and services.

The "all-inclusive" nature of that tax means Internet service has automatically fallen under the definition of a taxable service, said Richard Anklam, the president and executive director of the New Mexico Tax Research Institute.

"We've already taxed it, and we've always taxed it, so that (tax revenue) is money we'd have to get from somewhere else," Anklam said.

In Gov. Susana Martinez's administration, economists have been studying the issue closely, a Department of Finance and Administration spokesman said Wednesday.

"We would be concerned about any federal legislation that would affect the state budget, and we will continue to monitor this issue for additional developments," DFA spokesman Tim Korte told the Journal.

The bill, which was approved Tuesday via voice vote in the U.S. House of Representatives, would prohibit state and local governments from taxing Internet access. Named the Permanent Internet Tax Freedom Act, it still must be approved by the U.S. Senate before landing on President Barack Obama's desk for final action.

A law first passed in 1998 and renewed several times has barred any new state and local taxes on Internet service. However, taxes already in place - like New Mexico's - have been allowed to continue, a practice that would be halted by the legislation.

Members of New Mexico's congressional delegation are split on the bill.

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., has opposed it over concerns about state revenue impacts. Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., has supported it, with a spokesman saying the legislation "encourages greater access to the Internet" and could improve access in rural parts of the state.

Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., the third member of the state's House delegation, also voted in favor of the bill.

New Mexico has about 1.4 million Internet broadband connections, a figure that includes personal and business accounts, according to the Federal Communications Commission. Some accounts, such as those of nonprofit groups, are not taxed.

The $44 million revenue hit estimate for New Mexico released by the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities was based on that figure and the state's tax rate, said the study's author, Michael Mazerov.

GOP Senate candidate lends his campaign $555,000

BYLINE: BARRY MASSEY, Associated Press

LENGTH: 490 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

SANTA FE, N.M. (AP) - Democratic Sen. Tom Udall has stockpiled more than $3 million for his re-election bid, but Republican challenger Allen Weh is dipping into personal money to jumpstart his campaign for the general election.

Weh, a former state GOP chairman, has lent his campaign more than a half million dollars in the past three months, allowing him to raise more money than Udall during that time, according to a Federal Election Commission finance report and a fundraising summary released by Weh's campaign.

Udall reported $3.4 million in his campaign account at the end of last month. Weh had a balance of $627,806.

Weh raised $905,266 from April through June, with $555,000 coming from personal loans. His campaign spent about $483,000.

Udall reported total receipts of $890,105 during the past quarter, and his campaign spent about $607,000.

Weh won the GOP nomination in a two-way race in the June primary election. Udall had no primary opponent.

Weh is a retired Marine colonel who owns a charter aircraft and leasing company in Albuquerque.

In the 2nd Congressional District, Democratic challenger Roxanne "Rocky" Lara raised more money in the past three months than Republican incumbent Steve Pearce. Pearce still maintains an overall cash advantage, however.

Pearce reported nearly $1.5 million on hand at the end of last month and Lara had $711,821, according to reports filed with the FEC.

National Democrats have targeted the congressional race in southern New Mexico in hopes of flipping the seat from GOP control.

Lara raised $375,018 from April through June, and Pearce had receipts of $289,201. Both ran unopposed in the June primary election.

Labor union political action committees contributed at least $55,500 to Lara, including $7,500 each from PACs of the International Association of Fire Fighters and the United Food and Commercial Workers.

Pearce's top contributors included the PAC of Union Pacific Corp., which gave $7,000. The company recently opened a large railroad hub in the district near the border community of Santa Teresa.

In the Albuquerque area's 1st Congressional District, Democratic incumbent Michelle Lujan Grisham reported a cash balance of $922,790 and Republican Michael Frese had $12,171.

Grisham raised $241,155, including about $52,000 from health care industry PACs. Frese had total receipts of $51,923, including a personal loan of $10,000. Frese, a Corrales business owner, won a two-way primary race. Grisham had no primary opposition.

In northern New Mexico's 3rd District of, Democratic incumbent Ben Ray Lujan had nearly $581,565 on hand, and Republican Jefferson Byrd had $9,113.

Lujan raised $242,868, including $39,000 from health care and medical industry PACs. Byrd, who lost to Lujan two years ago, collected $22,032, including $2,500 from rancher Thomas Mitchell III, of Albert, and $500 from state Sen. William Sharer, of Farmington.

Lujan Visits Albuquerque VA Facility, Meets with Acting VA Secretary

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 306 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. (3rd CD), issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today after visiting the Raymond G. Murphy VA Medical Center in Albuquerque and meeting with Acting Secretary of the VA Sloan Gibson.

"The Albuquerque VA has experienced serious problems that have significantly impacted the quality and scheduling of care that New Mexico's veterans have received. This mismanagement strikes at the very heart of our commitment to our veterans and must be fixed quickly and thoroughly. Secretary Gibson's visit today provided an important opportunity to convey what New Mexico's veterans have experienced - from unacceptable wait times to care that fails to live up to our commitment.

"I expressed the importance of accountability and transparency at the Albuquerque VA, so that we can take the necessary steps to provide health care that is worthy of the service of these brave men and women. Secretary Gibson assured us that, as members of Congress, we would receive information from the New Mexico VA that is critical to perform our oversight responsibility, and ensuring our veterans receive the care they deserve. It is also essential that whistleblowers who step forward with concerns regarding the treatment of veterans are listened to, and not intimidated and discouraged from speaking up. A culture of intimidation must change, and we need leadership that will embrace those who share their concerns rather than trying to hide or ignore them.

"Finally, I highlighted for the Secretary the importance of seeing that our veterans in rural areas across New Mexico have access to high quality care and the need to address the challenges that are unique to these communities."

New Mexico Dems: Congressman Ben Ray Lujan Signs on to Constitutional Amendment to Limit Money in Politics

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 250 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District announced today that he has joined in an effort to limit money in politics by introducing an amendment to the United States Constitution. The constitutional amendment would overturn Supreme Court decisions like Citizens United v. FEC and McCutcheon v. FEC in an effort to reduce the growing influence of money in the political system. The constitutional amendment is the companion to the amendment introduced in the Senate by New Mexico Senator Tom Udall, and passed out of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

"Citizens United opened the floodgates for special-interest corporate money from hidden donors that seeks to influence elections. The McCutcheon decision further enhanced the ability of the wealthy few to unduly influence elections and have an outsized impact that drowns out the voice of the American people," Congressman Lujan said. "This amendment would take a critical step toward removing corporate influence in our elections and reaffirm the bedrock principles of our democracy by giving voice back to the people."

According to the Center for Responsive Politics, outside spending in elections tripled between 2008 and 2012 - with 93 percent of the more than $600 million spent in 2012 by Super PACs coming from about 3,300 donors, or .0011 percent of the American population.

Rangel Joins to Introduce the Democracy is For All Amendment; Rep. Charles B. Rangel (D-NY) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 845 words

Washington, D.C.- Congressman Charles B. Rangel co-introduced the Democracy for All Amendment with U.S. Reps. Ted (FL-21), Donna Edwards (MD-4), and Jim McGovern (MA-2). H. J. Res. 119 is the House companion to S. J. Res. 19, the constitutional amendment slated for a historic vote in the U.S. Senate this year. The Democracy is for All Amendment will reverse highly controversial Supreme Court decisions like Citizens United v. FEC and McCutcheon v. FEC, which have given corporations and the wealthiest donors the right to buy unlimited influence in our elections.

"Supreme Court decisions like Citizens United and McCutcheon have cast a dark shadow over our democracy by bringing us dangerously closer to an electoral system where the voices of everyday Americans are easily drowned out by corporations, shadowy front groups, and a handful of billionaires," said Rangel. "At a time when Americans of every political persuasion want big money out of our elections, the Democracy for All Amendment will restore their authority to pass laws protecting the integrity of our electoral process. By reversing Citizens United and related cases, this amendment will advance the basic principle of one voice, one vote that is so integral to our democracy."

Cosponsors (99): Deutch, Edwards, McGovern, Pelosi, Larson, Becerra, Conyers, Rangel, George Miller, Kaptur, DeFazio, Lewis, Slaughter, Pallone, Engel, McDermott, Serrano, Price, DeLauro, Norton, Waters, Timothy Bishop, Eshoo, Gene Green, Hastings (FL), Farr, Doggett, Doyle, Fattah, Jackson Lee, Lofgren, Blumenauer, Pascrell, Sherman, Meeks, Lee, Robert Brady, Capuano, Crowley, Holt, Schakowsky, Mike Thompson, Clay, Susan A. Background

Since the 2010 Citizens United decision, Americans have witnessed an unprecedented explosion of big money in state and federal elections. According to the Center for Responsive Politics, outside spending tripled between 2008 and 2012, and 93 percent of the more than $600 million spent in 2012 by Super PACs came from about 3,300 donors, or .0011 percent of the American population.

Beyond the explosion of outside spending invited by the Supreme Court's ruling in Citizens United, this decision also dramatically undermined the legitimacy of all campaign finance laws. In his far-reaching opinion for the 5-4 majority, Justice Kennedy held that any election law that goes beyond preventing quid pro quo, bribery-style corruption between candidates and donors risks violating the First Amendment. Unfortunately, in 2014 the Supreme Court only further embraced this narrow understanding of corruption in McCutcheon v. FEC when it invalidated aggregate limits on how much a single donor could spend per election cycle. Writing for the 5-4 majority, Chief Justice Roberts even went so far as to argue that the influence awarded to donors is not a corrupting quid pro quo transaction, but a First Amendment right.

Sponsored in the U.S. Senate by Senator Tom Udall (D-NM), S. J. Res. 19 was amended and passed out of the Senate Judiciary Committee on July 10, 2014. The provisions within the Democracy for All Amendment are the product of months of collaboration between the House and Senate sponsors of previously proposed constitutional amendments, constitutional scholars, and grassroots advocacy organizations committed to restoring the integrity of our electoral process. In addition to overturning recent rulings like Citizens United and McCutcheon, the Democracy is for All Amendment also reverses the Supreme Court's controversial holding in Buckley v. Valeo that spending money in elections is a form of speech protected by the First Amendment.

Section I. To advance democratic self-government and political equality, and to protect the integrity of government and the electoral process, Congress and the States may regulate and set reasonable limits on the raising and spending of money by candidates and others to influence elections.

Section II. Congress and the States shall have power to implement and enforce this article by appropriate legislation, and may distinguish between natural persons and corporations or other artificial entities created by law, including by prohibiting such entities from spending money to influence elections.

Section III. Nothing in this article shall be construed to grant Congress or the States the power to abridge the freedom of the press.

Lujan Signs on to Constitutional Amendment to Limit Money in Politics

LENGTH: 208 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District announced today that he has joined in an effort to limit money in politics by introducing an amendment to the United States Constitution. The constitutional amendment would overturn Supreme Court decisions like Citizens United v. FEC and McCutcheon v. FEC in an effort to reduce the growing influence of money in the political system. The constitutional amendment is the companion to the amendment introduced in the Senate by New Mexico Senator Tom Udall, and passed out of the Senate Judiciary Committee.

"Citizens United opened the floodgates for special-interest corporate money from hidden donors that seeks to influence elections. The McCutcheon decision further enhanced the ability of the wealthy few to unduly influence elections and have an outsized impact that drowns out the voice of the American people," Congressman Luján said. "This amendment would take a critical step toward removing corporate influence in our elections and reaffirm the bedrock principles of our democracy by giving voice back to the people."

CHC ON UNACCOMPANIED MINORS SITUATION

LENGTH: 1314 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Today, Congressional Hispanic Caucus (CHC) Chairman Rubén Hinojosa (TX-15) and Members of the CHC released the following statements following today's press conference on the unaccompanied minors situation.

CHC Chairman Rubén Hinojosa:"The Congressional Hispanic Caucus stands up in defense of the unaccompanied minors from Central America. This is an issue that is especially concerning to us because these are our kids. The children coming from our neighboring Latin American countries could be our nieces, nephews, grandkids. As a Caucus, we continue to fight for immigration reform and now, we join together to stand up for these unaccompanied children. We must ensure these children are protected under the law and that we find solutions to this humanitarian issue at hand."

CHC First Vice Chair, Congressman Ben Ray Luján (NM-03): "As Congress addresses this important issue of children and families arriving at our border, which is only further exacerbated by the lack of comprehensive immigration reform, we cannot lose sight of the fact that this is a humanitarian crisis. Many of the people fleeing to our southern border are doing so out of fear and desperation due to the threat of violence in their home countries. Yesterday, I met with nuns from New Mexico who have been on the front lines working to provide humanitarian aid to these children, and they told me a story that is tragically common throughout the region, of children being forced to join a gang and a family that was murdered to be made an example of when they tried to stand up to protect their child. As we move forward to address the President's request and the supplemental that will be brought to the House floor, we must not forget the plight of these children and the desperate circumstances they have faced in their home country. We must also work with our neighbors and allies in the region to see how we can help address the root cause of the violence that has gripped these countries."

CHC Second Vice Chair, Congresswoman Linda Sánchez (CA-38):"These children fled their countries through no fault of their own and they deserve their legal rights to due process provided under our current laws. Congress needs to act quickly and approve the supplemental funding that will allow our agencies to enforce our laws. As we near the end of our legislative calendar, I urge my Republican colleagues to get off the political fence and get to work on reforms that address our broken immigration system."

CHC Immigration Task Force Chair Luis V. Gutiérrez (IL-04):"The CHC is unified in supporting the fair treatment of children fleeing violence who are apprehended at our border and we support the President following the law and giving children a meaningful day in court to protect their rights under our laws. At the same time, we are urging the President to act boldly under current law to extend prosecutorial discretion and take other executive actions to fix our broken immigration system now that Republicans have failed to allow legislation to proceed. Clearly Republicans would rather sue the President than help him solve national problems or work with Democrats to serve the American people, and on immigration and the treatment of immigrants - especially children - Republicans will have to contend with the CHC."

Senator Robert Menendez (D-NJ): "For Republicans to politicize the heart-wrenching decision to send a child away as opportunistic and a way to take advantage of American law is as cynical a position as I have ever heard. We need to provide the President with the money he needs to handle the refugee crisis on our southern border. At the same time, I will strongly oppose any attempts to roll back current laws designed to protect the ability of these children and families to apply for asylum, trafficking protection and other specialized forms of relief. While not every child will have a valid claim, it is critically important that every child be given the chance to have due process. The bottom line is that we have to attack this problem from an immigration perspective, a foreign policy perspective, a refugee perspective, and a national security perspective. I am concerned and I am angry and it's time to fight back, but right now it's time to address the humanitarian crisis on our border."

Congresswoman Lucille Roybal- Allard (CA-40):"As we try to address the humanitarian crisis on our border, we must not abandon our American ideals or our moral obligation to care for these vulnerable children. We urge the Republican leadership to quickly pass a clean emergency supplemental spending bill and to not undermine the basic legal protections afforded these children under our laws. Short-term political considerations must not come before the long-term interests of children who could be unjustly returned to the violence and death from which they fled."

Congresswoman Nydia M. Velázquez (NY-07):"First and foremost, we must keep in mind these are children. We have a moral responsibility to ensure they receive assistance and are treated in a dignified, humane manner. How we treat the most vulnerable among us reflects on our character as a nation, and we must rise to the occasion to address this crisis."

Congresswoman Grace F. Napolitano (CA-32): "Congress, Republicans included, has voted three times since 2002 to include protection for refugees of violence. America is still in financial crisis, yet we have always been the beacon of hope for the oppressed around the world. Children must be protected not only by us but by their own governments, and we must go after the criminals who are threatening, killing, maiming, and trafficking them. It is critical that we follow the rule of law and our own immigration laws with compassion for these children who have been forced to flee their home countries."

Congresswoman Loretta Sanchez (CA-46),a senior member of the House Homeland Security Committee: "This is not a 'border security' problem. This is a complex humanitarian crisis that is a result of dire situations in these children's home countries: escalating gang violence, weak government institutions, a lack of social services and economic opportunity. But how poorly this is being addressed on our side is a result of our broken immigration system and we cannot brush this under the rug any longer."

Congressman Tony Cárdenas (CA-29):"This is not about enforcing immigration laws, because these are not immigrants seeking to come to America. They are refugee children seeking asylum from their war-torn countries, where they fear for their lives. America has always been the land where the persecuted could seek protection. This is who we are as a nation. The children at our southern border deserve our protection, they deserve due process, and if sending them home would put them in danger, they deserve sanctuary."

Congressman Joe Garcia (FL-26): "These children are but a symptom of a very broken immigration system that has failed our country for decades. We must focus our attention on the bigger picture - passing comprehensive immigration reform - and in the meantime, treat these children with the compassion they morally and legally deserve."

Congressman Juan Vargas (CA-51):"Our nation is facing a humanitarian crisis in which we have an opportunity to demonstrate the best values of our society. It is our duty and international obligation to provide due process for the children and families fleeing persecution and violence in their home countries. We must come together and treat them with dignity, compassion, respect and love. As we consider approving additional funds in response to this situation, we must protect a child's right to due process under existing law."

Lujan Calls for Needed Funding for Environmental Cleanup at LANL and to Restore Operations at WIPP

LENGTH: 441 words

DATELINE: Washington

Office of House of Representative Ben Ray Lujan, U.S Government has issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Luján of New Mexico's Third District spoke on the House floor today in an exchange with the Chairman of the House Energy and Water Development Appropriations Subcommittee, Rep. Mike Simpson. Luján encouraged appropriate funding for environmental cleanup at Los Alamos National Laboratory and to restore operations at the Waste Isolation Pilot Plant (WIPP). The exchange occurred during debate on the Fiscal Year 2015 Energy and Water Development Appropriations Act. Below are their remarks.

Mr. Lujan: Mr. Chairman, for over 70 years our national laboratories have worked to ensure the security of our nation. We have a responsibility to be good stewards of the environment in relation to the historic and ongoing radiological work at these laboratories. At Los Alamos, there are legal obligations, including the 3706 Campaign to remove Trans-Uranic, or TrU, Waste and the broader 2005 Consent Order between the Department of Energy (DOE) and the State of New Mexico, to remediate legacy waste at Los Alamos.

Two major wild fires near Los Alamos National Lab have highlighted the importance of removing above-ground waste from this facility. DOE was nearing completion of the 3706 campaign when the nation's only repository for TrU waste, the Waste Isolation Pilot Plant, experienced first a fire and then a radiological release.

As we work to restore WIPP operations, we must ensure that our national laboratories have the resources to meet their legal obligations for environmental remediation and also recognize our moral obligation to these communities who have served our great nation. It is with this intention that I request the Chair to work with me and Representatives from other affected communities as this bill moves forward to conference to ensure that adequate and appropriate funds are available, not only for restoration operations of WIPP, but also for legally mandated environmental remediation efforts at Los Alamos and other affected national laboratories.

I thank you for the time to address this important issue and look forward to working with you to find a solution.

Mr. Simpson: I'd like to thank the gentleman from New Mexico for his continued advocacy of the cleanup program at Los Alamos. I look forward to working with you on ensuring adequate funding is available to support the Department of Energy's cleanup program, including the cleanup work at Los Alamos and the restoration of operations at WIPP. And I thank the gentleman.

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District announced today that he has joined in an effort to limit money in politics by introducing an amendment to the United States Constitution. The constitutional amendment would overturn Supreme Court decisions like Citizens United v. FEC and McCutcheon v. FEC in an effort to reduce the growing influence of money in the political system. According to the Center for Responsive Politics, outside spending in elections tripled between 2008 and 2012 - with 93 percent of the more than $600 million spent in 2012 by Super PACs coming from about 3,300 donors, or .0011 percent of the American population.

New bill could eliminate gross receipts tax on NM Internet service

BYLINE: Dan Mayfield

LENGTH: 332 words

New Mexico could lose almost $44 million in tax revenue annually if Congress passes the new Permanent Internet Tax Freedom Act.

The House of Representatives is scheduled to vote this week on the bill, which would remove all sales taxes from Internet service.

In most of the country, it's not a big deal. But New Mexico is one of just seven states that tax Internet service.

"New Mexico has one of the broadest sales tax bases in the country, and so it wasn't that New Mexico sort of intentionally went out and started taxing it. It's broad and you tax services, unless explicitly exempted," said Michael Mazerov, the author of a new report for the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities, which shows what states will lose if the bill passes. The CBPP is a thinktank in Washington, D.C., that studies tax policies.

If the bill does not pass, states would be allowed to tax Internet services when a previous bill, the Internet Tax Freedom Act, expires on Nov. 1.

New Mexico's taxation of Internet service has been grandfathered into to the previous bill.

The Permanent Internet Tax Freedom Act, Mazerov told Business First, would cause New Mexico to lose $43.9 million in gross receipts tax revenue from the state's 1.4 million broadband connections. New Mexico charges a 5.1 percent gross receipts tax.

A spokesperson for Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grisham's office said it is looking into the bill. Representative Ben Ray Lujan's office did not respond to a request for comment.

"There is a question about how much price matters. This is a costly and inefficient way to subsidize the Internet," Mazerov said. "In New Mexico, you're used to paying sales tax on things."

The PITFA, however, passed the house Judicial Committee last week by a large margin.

SGR heads to D.C.

SECTION: TODAY'S NEWS

LENGTH: 169 words

This past week, Rep. Stephanie Garcia Richard (D-Los Alamos, Santa Fe, Sandoval and Rio Arriba) traveled to Washington D.C. to meet with New Mexico's federal delegation and discuss LANL funding and NNSA procurement policies. In her meetings with Senators Tom Udall and Martin Henrich and Representatives Ben Ray Lujan, Michelle Lujan Grisham and Steve Pearce, Garcia Richard stressed the region's concerns that the NNSA is wanting LANL and other NNSA facilities to use the NNSA Supply Chain Management Center (SCMC) for commodity purchases under unequal and non-competitive terms. This NNSA directive bypasses the normal competitive LANL RFP process and drives LANL purchases away from local and regional contractors to out-of-state firms. Garcia Richard asked the Congressional delegation to support a proposal to have NNSA/DOE provide resources and guidelines for a regional business cooperative that will allow New Mexico based contractors to become competitive and participate in the NNSA SCMC procurement system.

VA stiff-arms NM delegation's information request

BYLINE: Michael Coleman, JOURNAL WASHINGTON BUREAU PUBLISHED: THURSDAY, JULY 10, 2014 AT 3:57 PM

SECTION: INSIDE THE BELTWAY

LENGTH: 830 words

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. - New Mexico's congressional delegation is demanding answers from the Veterans Administration after Albuquerque VA officials told congressional staffers this week that they must submit federal Freedom of Information Act requests to learn more about VA health care policies.

All five delegation members - Democratic Sens. Martin Heinrich and Tom Udall, Democratic Reps. Michelle Lujan Grisham and Ben Ray Lujan, and Republican Rep. Steve Pearce - signed a letter to Sloan D. Gibson, the acting VA secretary on Thursday. The letter said the Albuquerque VA's insistence that members of Congress file official requests for information showed "an alarming ignorance or an utter disregard" for congressional oversight.

The letter stems from a conference call on Monday among staffers for the New Mexico congressional delegation and top staff at the Albuquerque VA, including interim Director Dr. James Robbins. Ongoing problems at the Albuquerque VA Hospital, punctuated by the June 30 death of Jim Napoleon Garcia, a Vietnam War veteran who suffered a heart attack in the hospital's cafeteria on June 30 and died after waiting for an ambulance to arrive, prompted the conference call. The Department of Veterans Affairs remains under intense scrutiny for widespread reports of long delays for treatment and medical appointments and of veterans dying while on waiting lists.

"We have frequently asked the VA Hospital to provide us with its written policies and practices related to scheduling, patient wait time, bonus and performance award system, and general management issues including how schedulers are trained," the letter said. "However, VA Hospital staff has repeatedly denied this information to us and most recently told our offices that we must file Freedom of Information Act requests for all written VA Hospital documentation. Such responses tremendously impede our constitutional responsibility to oversee the faithful execution of the laws we pass."

After Garcia collapsed at the Albuquerque VA, an onlooker called 911 but VA staff did not mobilize an on-site VA Hospital EMS team to provide emergency medical services, the letter states.

"According to the VA, staff acted in accordance with an April 4, 2014 Medical Center Memorandum, which defines VA Hospital policy during medical emergencies on campus," the delegation's letter said. "However, when congressional staff asked for copies of the Medical Center Memo, VA Hospital staff withheld this material and asserted that the only way to obtain this information would be to file a FOIA request."

Officials at the Albuquerque VA did not respond to a request for comment from the Journal on Thursday.

The congressional letter asks the VA to explain its policy "for training VA Hospital staff in responding to congressional inquiries."

"Is it a common practice to condition disclosure of such information on a congressional office first filing a FOIA request," the letter asks.

It also asks for clarity on why it won't release the Medical Center Memo outlining its procedures for an on-site medical emergency, as well as other records pertaining to the ongoing VA crisis in scheduling appointments.

"If you are unable to comply with these requests, please explain how this is consistent with VA standards for sharing information with Congress and the millions of veterans served by the VA," the letter said.

According to a document obtained by the Journal last week, a policy instituted in 2010 and signed by then-director George Marnell directs the VA medical center Code Blue Team to respond to medical emergencies in six buildings on the 88-acre property off of San Pedro SE. The buildings include the main hospital in Building 41, but the cafeteria or canteen aren't mentioned.

Code Blue Team members include a physician, an intensive care unit nurse, a health technician, a nursing supervisor, an anesthesiologist, a respiratory therapist and a pharmacist, if needed.

The policy goes on to state: "For medical emergencies out of the Code Blue Team response areas, the Albuquerque EMS system via 911 will be activated. Outpatients or non-patients responded to by Albuquerque EMS who have suffered a cardiac and/or respiratory arrest will be transported to the VA medical center's emergency department, the policy adds. Outpatients or non-patients who haven't suffered a cardiopulmonary arrest will be transported per Albuquerque EMS protocols. And all medical emergencies involving children regardless of the location on the VA Medical Center campus are to be dealt with by Albuquerque EMS via a 911 call.

The policy requires medical center staff who witness a life-threatening event to give CPR or emergency aid regardless of the location. Staff members are to remain with the individual until emergency help arrives.

Gov. blames Obama for border crisis; Martinez also faults Congress for federal 'failure of leadership'

BYLINE: Copyright © 2014 Albuquerque Journal BY DAN BOYD JOURNAL CAPITOL BUREAU

LENGTH: 652 words

SANTA FE - Gov. Susana Martinez says President Barack Obama and Congress are to blame for the wave of Central American immigrants - many of them unaccompanied children - that has prompted the opening of temporary housing facilities, including one in southeastern New Mexico.

Martinez said the crisis is, at least in part, the byproduct of mixed signals on the federal level.

"Immigrants flood across the border - or parents drop their children there - expecting the federal government to just throw up its hands and let them in. That's not an immigration policy - that's a failure of leadership," the governor said. "We will continue to push the federal government for regular communication and proper planning relating to the operation of this makeshift detention facility in southeast New Mexico."

Since the federal government announced its plan for dealing with the influx of immigrants, the first-term Republican governor has spoken with U.S. Department of Homeland Security and Immigration and Customs Enforcement officials to convey security concerns and keep track of developments, a spokesman said.

She has not visited the facility but sent her public safety chief, Greg Fouratt, to tour the converted Border Patrol training center in Artesia where women with children who entered the country illegally are being housed.

"The immigration situation we face today is a direct failure of gridlocked Washington lawmakers and President Obama," Martinez said in a statement to the Journal.

"I share the frustration that people throughout the state, and in the Artesia area, are feeling," Martinez added. "In fact, what has been unfolding in border states represents the human consequence of Washington's dysfunction."

Late last month, ICE began housing detained female immigrants traveling with children at the converted Federal Law Enforcement Training Center in Artesia.

Artesia Mayor Phillip Burch , after meeting with federal officials Tuesday, said there are now 217 immigrants being held at the center, which he said has a maximum projected capacity of 672 people.

Most of the individuals are expected to eventually be deported to their home countries, which are typically Honduras, Guatemala and El Salvador. Some could remain in the United States, if petitions for asylum are granted.

Martinez, the nation's first female Hispanic governor, has touted the need for federal immigration reform. Some of her own policies in New Mexico - especially her push to repeal the law that allows foreign nationals in the country illegally to obtain driver's licenses - have drawn criticism from immigrant advocacy groups. Democratic members of New Mexico's congressional delegation have criticized leaders of the Republican-controlled U.S. House of Representatives for not holding a vote on a Senate-passed bill that would make changes to the nation's immigration system.

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., recently told the Journal that Martinez should lobby House Speaker John Boehner, R-Ohio, and other Republicans to put the bill to a vote.

Meanwhile, Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., said he was encouraged by Obama's plan to use his executive authority to circumvent Congress on the issue.

Obama has instructed top-ranking aides to present him with possible executive actions he could take by the end of this summer.

Artesia residents have voiced mixed feelings about the converted training facility being used as a detention center.

Many of the 400 people who attended a town hall meeting last week spoke in opposition to the plan, with concerns ranging from the possible spread of disease to taxpayer costs, according to local news reports.

"I think right now it's a mixed bag (of opinions)," Burch said in a Tuesday interview. "It ranges from concern to anger to 'What can we do to help?'"

Burch, who spoke with Martinez last week, said there have been no reports of detained immigrants trying to escape from the Artesia center.

Julian Castroandapos;s strong record of leadership and commitment to expanding opportunity for hard-working families will serve him well in this important role. He brings a passion for public service and will be a fierce advocate for the middle class as he works to implement policies that build stronger communities across our country."

CHC Whip, Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grishman (NM-01): "Congratulations to Secretary Castro on his appointment to HUD. Throughout his career, he has been a tireless advocate for fair and affordable housing who understands the role of diversity in urban development, and I look forward to him bringing that same level of excellence to HUD. Many in my home state of New Mexico are still struggling with the impacts of the housing crisis that triggered the recession, and I look forward to working with Secretary Castro to help homeowners stay in their homes and develop our communities."

Congresswoman Lucille Roybal- Allard (CA-40): "I was honored to be present in the U.S. Senate today to witness the confirmation of Julian Castro as our nationandapos;s new Secretary of Housing and Urban Development. As the mayor of a large American city and as a Latino, Secretary Castro will bring a unique perspective to the important housing and economic development issues facing our nation in the ongoing recovery. I am confident Secretary Castro will be a thoughtful and effective manager of these housing and economic challenges, as well as a superb advocate for the needs of Latinos, and all Americans, in the Presidentandapos;s Cabinet."

Congresswoman Nydia M. Velazquez (NY-07): "Mayor Castro brings to HUD the background, vision and skills necessary to advance the agencyandapos;s mission of making housing more affordable and our communities more livable."

Congresswoman Grace F. Napolitano (CA-32): "We congratulate Secretary Julian Castro on his spectacular achievements and look forward to working with him to address our nation's housing needs, including veterans' homelessness. Secretary Castro will be a welcome addition to the Administration and our nation."

Congressman Henry Cuellar (TX-28): "I congratulate Mayor Castro for his successful confirmation as our next Secretary of Housing and Urban Development. I am pleased to see a fellow Texan join the Administration and I know Mayor Castro will serve with distinction. I look forward to working with him here in Washington and wish him all the best."

Congressman Tony Cardenas (CA-29): "Mayor Castro has been given a tremendous task, and I am confident that he is the right man to handle it. As a former real estate broker, I fully understand the challenges present in our housing market. Housing drives our economy and creates tremendous numbers of jobs, but it also can be a light shone into the shadows of our nation. Too many Americans live in fear, unsure where they will sleep each night. I trust that Mayor Castro will work with his department to not only improve the housing situation in this nation, but to help encourage a solution to the poverty and homelessness that has laid low so many Americans."

Congressman Joe Garcia (FL-26): "Mayor Julian Castro is well-deserving of this appointment and will be an invaluable member of the Presidentandapos;s Cabinet. Over the last several years, Julian has proven his ability to successfully lead his community and I have no doubt he will do the same in his new post."

Congressman Pete P. Gallego (TX-23): "Today, Julian Castro proves to little boys and girls, Latino and non-Latino alike, that dreams can come true. Congratulations, Mr. Secretary, and best of luck. As my mom would say, andapos;Que dios te bendiga.andapos;"

LUJAN CALLS FOR NEEDED FUNDING FOR ENVIRONMENTAL CLEANUP AT LANL AND TO RESTORE OPERATIONS AT WIPP; Secures Commitment from Subcommittee Chair to Work with Him on Critical Issues to New Mexico; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

LENGTH: 443 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District spoke on the House floor today in an exchange with the Chairman of the House Energy and Water Development Appropriations Subcommittee, Rep. Mike Simpson. Lujan encouraged appropriate funding for environmental cleanup at Los Alamos National Laboratory and to restore operations at the Waste Isolation Pilot Plant (WIPP). The exchange occurred during debate on the Fiscal Year 2015 Energy and Water Development Appropriations Act. Below are their remarks.

Mr. Lujan: Mr. Chairman, for over 70 years our national laboratories have worked to ensure the security of our nation. We have a responsibility to be good stewards of the environment in relation to the historic and ongoing radiological work at these laboratories. At Los Alamos, there are legal obligations, including the 3706 Campaign to remove Trans-Uranic, or TrU, Waste and the broader 2005 Consent Order between the Department of Energy (DOE) and the State of New Mexico, to remediate legacy waste at Los Alamos.

Two major wild fires near Los Alamos National Lab have highlighted the importance of removing above-ground waste from this facility. DOE was nearing completion of the 3706 campaign when the nation's only repository for TrU waste, the Waste Isolation Pilot Plant, experienced first a fire and then a radiological release.

As we work to restore WIPP operations, we must ensure that our national laboratories have the resources to meet their legal obligations for environmental remediation and also recognize our moral obligation to these communities who have served our great nation. It is with this intention that I request the Chair to work with me and Representatives from other affected communities as this bill moves forward to conference to ensure that adequate and appropriate funds are available, not only for restoration operations of WIPP, but also for legally mandated environmental remediation efforts at Los Alamos and other affected national laboratories.

I thank you for the time to address this important issue and look forward to working with you to find a solution.

Mr. Simpson: I'd like to thank the gentleman from New Mexico for his continued advocacy of the cleanup program at Los Alamos. I look forward to working with you on ensuring adequate funding is available to support the Department of Energy's cleanup program, including the cleanup work at Los Alamos and the restoration of operations at WIPP. And I thank the gentleman.

LUJAN HIGHLIGHTS NEED TO RECOVER FUNDING FOR RIO RANCHO AND OTHER COMMUNITIES WORKING WITH ARMY CORPS OF ENGINEERS

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 554 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District offered an amendment to the Energy and Water Appropriations bill today in an effort to highlight the importance of increasing funding for accounts within the Army Corps of Engineers' budget so that it can reimburse local governments for infrastructure projects.Lujan withdrew the amendment after securing a commitment from Energy and Water Appropriations Subcommittee Chair Mike Simpson to work on this important issue with him. Below are Lujan's remarks.

"Mr. Chairman, I rise to amend the Energy and Water Appropriations bill to increase the Construction Account by $15 million to ensure local governments, like the City of Rio Rancho, the County of Bernalillo, and the Middle Rio Grande Conservancy District, get reimbursed for work they have done in conjunction with the Army Corps of Engineers. The Army Corps of Engineers works with local governments in New Mexico to construct levies, implement flood control measures, and other important infrastructure for the safety of the public.

"More specifically, the City of Rio Rancho entered into a reimbursement contract with the Army Corps of Engineers and has not been paid back for several years due to the lack of appropriations. The same goes for the County of Bernalillo, the Middle Rio Grande Conservancy District, and other communities across the United States. This delay in reimbursement has led to interruptions in financing for other city projects and also has the potential to hurt the credit rating of these entities if they do not recover these funds via reimbursement, as stated in their contracts with the federal government.

"By increasing the dollar amount in this account, which includes a number of programs and accounts that are critical to local governments - like engineering, construction, technical assistance, flood control, and environmental infrastructure - we can get these entities reimbursed and get these liabilities off the books of the Army Corps of Engineers and get other projects going.

"According to the Congressional Budget Office this increase has zero impact on the budget, and in fact would save money by reducing the liability for the federal government.

"Mr. Chairman, local governments have been left holding an IOU from the federal government for doing work based on good faith written agreements with the Army Corps of Engineers.

"Mr. Chairman, I understand there may be opposition from some of my colleagues, but I am hoping that I can persuade the Chairman [Simpson] to support me in this effort.

"Under Section 593 of the Water Resources Development Act of 1999, the City of Rio Rancho and other local governments entered into agreements with the Army Corps of Engineers. When city and local governments enter into reimbursement contracts they expect to be reimbursed. They have annual budgets with the expectations they will get paid back. Congress should live up to these obligations in the authority given to the agency by Congress.

"And Mr. Chairman, I understand the constraints that the subcommittee dealt with the allocations given to them, but we need to make sure we are working to make these local governments whole with agreements and contracts with the federal government."

Susana feasts on Dems' state chair

BYLINE: Hal Rhodes

SECTION: COLUMNS

LENGTH: 602 words

Unless every last New Mexico Democrat with any influence whatsoever has suddenly fallen victim to persistent and pervasive masochism, Sam Bregman's days as state party chairman are numbered.

Aren't they? Doesn't everything we know about politics and the logic thereof dictate that he must either leave his post voluntarily or face pressure from those top state Democrats capable of rational election year thought to resign his chairmanship?

The miracle is that prominent Democrats up for election or reelection this year - Tom Udall, Ben Ray Luján, Michele Luján Grisham, Hector Balderas, the whole lot of them, including Gary King - haven't already quietly taken Bregman by the neck and given him the boot.

Admittedly the metaphor is mixed. But Bregman has become the main course in the buffet of campaign hash Susana Martinez has been serving New Mexico voters since primary election day when she walked away with her party's nomination for a second term as governor.

Who knows what's fair and what's not in today's political climate?

A case can be made for the proposition that Gary King has been a dandy attorney general during his two terms in that post. Nonetheless, Susana (or her fat cat donors) has spent whole barrels of money on TV advertisements advancing the claim that Bregman once dismissed King as among the worst AGs in state history.

The ad popped up on New Mexicans television screens virtually with the close of primary election day polls and it subsequently played so often that many viewers could lip sync it verbatim.

Bregman has responded to the effect that the remark came from someone else and, besides, it was made in the heat of a legal dust-up in his capacity as a private attorney.

Make of that what you will.

More recently the Democratic chairman found himself making fresh front-page news after a gaggle of former Martinez aides and confreres slapped him (among others) with a federal suit for conspiracy to distribute those now-infamous hacked Martinez emails, about which the governor has raised such a ruckus.

An ex-Martinez campaign manager has pled guilty to the hacking, but apparently the governor and her operatives want to milk every last drop of political blood it can out this contretemps before letting it go.

Why Martinez or her campaign would want to keep her emails in the headlines is another question.

The portraits that emerged from those portions of these communiqués, which have been made public, hardly show Martinez and her political advisors to their best advantage. This is a governor who discourses with a salty tongue and a wobbly understanding of a wide range of matters involving state affairs. Her male campaign cohorts, in turn, come across as long on attitude, short on thought, full of themselves, borderline foul-mouth.

None of this is the least surprising to veteran political journalists familiar with campaigns and campaigners.

Off-the-campaign trail, however, rank and file voters probably find it off-putting, which is why most politicians try to keep it out of public view.

But not Martinez. Her snit about these pilfered emails has become a top issue in her campaign. What Bregman did or did not do with those emails is something that will presumably be determined in a federal court.

It hardly ranks among the truly important questions - jobs going elsewhere, workers going elsewhere, the whole litany of economic stagnation in the state - facing New Mexico voters this year.

It is, however, a useful distraction for a governor running for reelection in hard times. So you have to wonder how much longer Democratic Chairman Bregman can hang on.

LUJAN HIGHLIGHTS $500,000 FOR NEW MEXICO THROUGH THE LAND AND WATER CONSERVATION FUND

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 276 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, D.C

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District highlighted today more than $500,000 in funding for the state of New Mexico through the Land and Water Conservation Fund (LWCF). These resources will help fund outdoor recreation and conservation projects as part of a $43 million investment in all 50 states, the territories, and the District of Columbia.

"New Mexico is blessed with precious lands that are a part of our culture and way of life," Congressman Lujan said. "Ensuring the protection and preservation of our land and water is essential and the Land and Water Conservation Fund provides important resources that help create more opportunities for our communities to enjoy the great outdoors. In addition, investments in outdoor recreation strengthen an important sector that contributes to New Mexico's economy and creates jobs in our communities."

For the past 50 years, the Land and Water Conservation Fund has helped increase access to outdoor recreation resources by providing funds to federal, state, and local governments to purchase land, water, and wetlands. The primary source of revenue to LWCF is from federal oil and gas leases on the Outer Continental Shelf. Over the past five decades, New Mexico has received nearly $250 million that have helped fund projects in the Santa Fe National Forest, the Chaco Culture National Historical Park, and the Bandelier National Monument. This year, New Mexico is receiving $507,107. A recent analysis found that every $1 invested in land acquisition through LWCF generated a $4 return on the investment.

Obama says he'll go it alone on immigration; 2 members of NM delegation critical

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN AND LAUREN VILLAGRAN JOURNAL STAFF WRITERS

SECTION: NEWS; Pg. A3

LENGTH: 880 words

WASHINGTON - President Barack Obama's request Monday for $2 billion in emergency funding to help stem an immigration crisis on the Mexican border was described as "just another Band-Aid" by a Democratic New Mexico lawmaker, while the congressional delegation's lone Republican accused the president of "exploiting" the crisis.

In addition to the funding request of Congress, Obama said Monday that he will bypass Republicans in Congress and move to change immigration policy where he can through executive actions. The president said he will refocus immigration enforcement onto a Mexican border that has seen a tide of children crossing illegally from Central America. That means devoting more resources to deporting the most recent border crossers and those who pose a threat to public safety and national security.

"I take executive action only when we have a serious problem, a serious issue, and Congress chooses to do nothing," Obama said at the White House. "And in this situation, the failure of House Republicans to pass a darn bill is bad for our security, it's bad for our economy and it's bad for our future."

Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., said the president's plan won't solve the nation's immigration problem in the long term. She also urged House Republicans to take up an immigration reform bill passed by the Senate last year.

"The president's request for more funding is just another Band-Aid on our broken immigration system," Lujan Grisham said. "We need to put more pressure on the Republican leadership to do the right thing and allow an up-or-down vote. I'm pleased that Gov. Martinez expressed an interest last week in the immigration reform debate. I think she could be particularly helpful, and I would urge the governor to lobby Speaker Boehner and her fellow Republicans in Congress to put comprehensive immigration reform to a vote."

Meanwhile, Rep. Steve Pearce, a New Mexico Republican appointed to a special congressional working group to help handle the border crisis, said the president's $2 billion request was "staggering."

"President Obama is exploiting the humanitarian crisis at our southern border," Pearce said. "This emergency does not give Obama an excuse to abuse his executive authority and circumvent Congress once again. The problem at our southern border is a tragedy, caused by the president's own executive orders that gave false hope to children and their families. They are now suffering in crowded border facilities, with some women and children being processed as detainees in southern New Mexico."

Rep. Ben Ray Luján, D-N.M., said he was "encouraged" by Obama's talk of using executive authority to circumvent a Congress that appears hopelessly gridlocked on the subject of immigration reform.

"I am encouraged that President Obama has pledged to enact solutions available to him through executive action," Luján said. "I look forward to his administration's recommendations to ensure our borders are secure while providing flexibility for those who would be eligible for a pathway to citizenship under current legislative proposals."

Obama has instructed Homeland Security Department Secretary Jeh Johnson and Attorney General Eric Holder to present him with executive actions he can take without congressional approval by the end of the summer.

In responding to the influx of unaccompanied children, Obama plans to concentrate immigration resources on the border areas. The move will reduce the number of deportations in the country's interior by stressing enforcement action on individuals who are either recent unlawful border crossers or who present a national security, public safety or border security threat.

The decision coincides with a White House request to Congress for new powers to deport newly arrived immigrant children traveling without their parents.

ICE began housing detained adult migrants traveling with children at a converted Border Patrol training facility in New Mexico on Friday. The temporary detention center, which has a capacity of 700, is now holding 168 people, an ICE official said.

The administration's proposal to expedite removal proceedings for unaccompanied minors angered some proponents of immigrant rights. Under current law, minors from countries that don't share a border with the U.S. are automatically afforded a hearing to assess whether they are eligible for asylum or other relief from deportation.

The administration's proposal will have children screened by a Border Patrol agent upon their arrival, at a time when they "are hungry, tired, confused and not familiar with our immigration system," said Wendy Kind, president of Kids in Need of Defense, or KIND. "This is grossly unfair and fails to recognize their capacity as children to navigate our immigration system."

Melysa Sperber, director of the Alliance to End Slavery and Trafficking, said the expedited screenings "are not child-friendly or child-appropriate" and that children with a legitimate fear of violence or threats in their home countries "will slip through the cracks."

"We need to ensure that due process protections are afforded to these children in a real way," she said, including ensuring they receive legal representation.

LUJAN STATEMENT ON IMMIGRATION REFORM; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 301 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on President Obama's speech on immigration reform and the announcement that Speaker John Boehner will not allow the House to act on comprehensive immigration reform this year.

"It is shameful that the Republican House leadership has failed to act on immigration reform and has now confirmed that they have no intention of doing so. Over a year ago, after working on a bipartisan good-faith compromise, Senate Democrats and Republicans were able to come together to pass a comprehensive immigration reform bill. It has since languished in the House - alongside a House Democratic proposal modeled on the Senate version - with no action by Speaker Boehner and the Republican leadership. Despite their empty rhetoric, House Republicans have remained the one road block to passing much-needed reform that strengthens our economy and our security.

"I agree with the President that Congress must act if we are to finally fix our broken immigration system once and for all. And while it is deeply disappointing that House Republicans are refusing to listen to a broad majority of Americans who support comprehensive immigration reform, I am encouraged that President Obama has pledged to the enact solutions available to him through executive action. I look forward to his Administration's recommendations to ensure our borders are secure while providing flexibility for those who would be eligible for a pathway to citizenship under current legislative proposals - particularly DREAMers, who want to come out of the shadows and contribute to the only home that many of them have ever known."

CHC On 1-Year Anniversary Of Senate Immigration Bill Passage; Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 1302 words

Washington, DC- Today, Congressional Hispanic Caucus (CHC) Chairman Ruben Hinojosa (TX-15) and Members of the CHC released the following statements on the one-year anniversary of the Senate's passage of S. 744, the comprehensive immigration reform bill. The Senate passed this legislation with a final vote of 68-32 on June 27, 2013.

CHC Chairman Ruben Hinojosa: "One year ago, we all expressed optimism that this Congress would be the one that fixed our broken immigration system, but our Republican colleagues in the House have refused to act. The passage of the Senate immigration bill showed us that it is possible for Republicans and Democrats to come together to solve some of our nation's most pressing problems. The Senate has done its job and it is critical that we in the House now do our job. Now is the time to pass comprehensive immigration reform."

CHC First Vice Chair, Congressman Ben Ray Lujan (NM-03): "One year ago, Democrats and Republicans in the Senate worked together to pass comprehensive immigration reform that is good for our economy, strengthens our security, and recognizes the contributions that immigrants make to our country. Over the past year, House Republicans failed to even bring an immigration bill up for a vote. Earlier this year, Republican Leadership outlined their 'principles for immigration reform,' yet failed to introduce a bill based on these principles. Instead of bringing up comprehensive legislation that spurs economic growth and lowers the deficit, we have seen attacks on DREAMers and excuses for inaction. Democrats and Republicans in the Senate have acted. Democrats in the House support reform and have also introduced a bill. A broad coalition - from the high tech sector to law enforcement, the faith community to agriculture - backs reform. The American people overwhelmingly favor a comprehensive bill. The only ones standing in the way are House Republicans. It's time to do what is right for our country and bring comprehensive immigration reform up for a vote."

CHC Second Vice Chair, Congresswoman Linda T. Sanchez (CA-38): "It is incredibly frustrating that House Republicans continue to ignore our broken immigration system. Their inaction has very real human and economic costs. More than 11 million people who want to pay taxes and contribute to our great country are stuck in limbo. Each day that Republicans continue to delay action, is a day that approximately 1,100 families get separated. Passing comprehensive immigration reform would allow us to capitalize on the potential to create 159,000 new jobs and collect $1.25 billion in revenue over the next decade. It's time for Speaker Boehner to cut the excuses- our country deserves a vote."

CHC Whip, Congresswoman Michelle Lujan Grishman (NM-01): "A year ago, the Senate did its job by passing a bipartisan immigration bill, and since then Republican leadership has sat on its hands. House Republicans have stalled any and all efforts to pass immigration reform. The time to act is now. Republicans need to join Democrats and work toward a comprehensive solution that will fix our broken immigration system, create jobs, and build a stronger economy."

Congressman Xavier Becerra (CA-34), Chairman of the House Democratic Caucus: "Republicans in the House haven't listened to their Republican colleagues in the Senate. And it's certainly clear that they're not listening to the American people who overwhelmingly want us to fix this broken immigration system. House Republicans have a choice: they can do this the American way, by passing commonsense immigration reform, or they can do this the Tea Party way. We hope House Republicans choose the American way to do business and fix our broken immigration system."

CHC Immigration Task Force Chair, Congressman Luis V. Gutierrez (IL-04): "We offered to work with Republicans and we have been willing to compromise to pass a bill that enhances border security, facilitates legal immigration, clears backlogs for those waiting to come legally, implements E-Verify, and gets undocumented immigrants into the system and on-the-books. But we need a dance partner to work in a bipartisan manner and so far, Republicans have refused to take any action and are threatening to sue the President if he does. We have got to refocus our resources on deporting criminals and keeping out threats, but Republicans are standing in the way."

Senator Robert Menendez (D-NY), one of the authors of the Senate's comprehensive immigration reform bill: "We are at the end of the line, it looks as though the Republicans are giving up on our last chance to bring 11 million people out of the shadows. One year later - after hundreds of rallies, thousands of advocacy meetings, and hundreds of thousands of families being torn apart - immigration reform sits languishing in the House of Representatives while the country waits, 11 million people wait, and the toll from Republican inaction compounds. I truly hope our Republican colleagues in the House don't forget their immigrant heritage. I hope they understand exactly what the cost of their inaction is, and what it will mean to stand on the wrong side of history just to score political points in a handful of the most conservative districts in the country. The clock is ticking away, and while history is not on their side, the lives of millions are in their hands."

Congresswoman Nydia M. Velazquez (NY-07): "It has been one year since the Senate passed immigration reform legislation, yet House Republicans continue stalling, making excuses and failing to act. It is time to reform our nation's broken immigration system in a way that honors families, fuels innovation and strengthens our economy for all Americans."

Congressman Tony Cardenas (CA-29): "Today, we recognize the courage of action shown in the Senate to fix our clearly broken immigration system and bring millions of families out of the shadows.

Meanwhile, Republicans in the House are ignoring the vast majority of Americans, who want comprehensive reform. They are ignoring $900 billion in deficit relief that immigration reform would provide. They are ignoring the 120,000 jobs that could have been created this year. Most of all, however, they are ignoring the American Dream. Millions of families are in this country, working hard, and crying out for a chance to pay a fine, learn English and help rebuild our nation. To not even have a debate on this critical legislation, one year on, is a complete lack of leadership by the majority of our House."

Congressman Joe Garcia (FL-26), author of H.R. 15: "It is disappointing that in 365 days, this body has done nothing but find excuses" said Garcia. "We need to stop with the finger-pointing and start the governing. If we had passed immigration reform, we would have taken care of the people who are already here and directed resources to the criminals, traffickers, and people who wish to do this nation harm. We would have a comprehensive strategy at the border, so that we could stop throwing money at the problem and militarizing border communities. And we would have an immigration system that meets the needs of our economy, instead of ceding ground to competing nations."

Congressman Juan Vargas: (CA-51): "An overwhelming coalition of religious, community, and business leaders all agree that our nation can't wait any longer for immigration reform. The Senate did their part, working tirelessly to send a bipartisan Comprehensive Immigration Reform bill to the House, yet Republican leadership has chosen to do nothing for one full year. We must fix our broken immigration system. Now is the time to come together and bring Comprehensive Immigration Reform to the floor for a vote."

LUJAN HIGHLIGHTS $37 MILLION IN PILT PAYMENTS FOR NEW MEXICO COUNTIES;
3rd District Counties Receiving Nearly $12 Million;
Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 404 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District highlighted today more than $37 million that New Mexico counties are receiving through the Payment in Lieu of Taxes (PILT) program for Fiscal Year 2014. Department of Interior Secretary Sally Jewel announced that 32 local governments throughout New Mexico are receiving $37,677,905 - $3 million more than last year - through the program that compensates counties and local governments for non-taxable federal land in their jurisdictions.

"The PILT program provides vital resources for New Mexico's rural counties that help support efforts to build schools, improve roads, and hire first responders," Congressman Lujan said. "Our communities are home to a significant amount of federal lands, which impacts the amount of revenue local governments can take in. PILT funds help offset this while contributing to our counties' ability to provide important services."

Local governments that contain nontaxable federal lands and provide vital government services - such as public safety, housing, social services and transportation - are eligible for the PILT program. PILT compensates these jurisdictions - which provide significant support for national parks, wildlife refuges and recreation areas - for their support and foregone tax revenue from these federal lands.

Using a formula provided in statute, the annual PILT payments to local governments are computed based on the number of acres of federal entitlement land within each county or jurisdiction and the population of that county or jurisdiction. The lands include the National Forest and National Parks Systems, those managed by the Bureau of Land Management, those affected by Corps of Engineers and Bureau of Reclamation water resources development projects, and others. A breakdown of PILT payments by county in the Third District is below and a full breakdown for all New Mexico counties is available at www.doi.gov/pilt.

College students could qualify for lower loan payments

BYLINE: Lillian Bowe, The Portales News-Tribune, N.M.

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 426 words

June 25--Kamarie Schmidt recently graduated from Eastern New Mexico University and in order to pay for her degree, she had to take out student loans.

Schmidt, a native of Farwell who earned her degrees in music education and instrumental performance saxophone, said even though she is going to graduate school in the fall, paying off the loans is still an issue for her.

"When I finish graduate school, I have six months until I have to pay it off, but it's still there," Schmidt said.

After an executive order was signed by President Barack Obama earlier this month, Schmidt and 2,100 other ENMU students who take out loans annually, could qualify to pay off their loan at 10 percent of their disposable income. If the loan is not paid off after 20 years, the rest will be forgiven.

Before this executive order, with the Pay As You Earn program, only newer borrowers were eligible. By 2015, borrowers that took loans before October 2007 or stopped borrowing by October 2011 will be eligible.

According to government officials, an estimate of 5 million people will now qualify for the program.

Schmidt said the plan would help a lot of people, but 10 percent is still a lot for some.

"I think it will help people, but it depends on what career or job you get into. Some people, the 10 percent will still be hard to pay," Schmidt said.

Brent Small, ENMU director of financial aid, champions the addition to the program.

"I think the program will help graduates tremendously," Small said.

Small said it helps graduates who are underemployed or have not found a career in their chosen field.

"The program will help our students in the future who borrow, but it will not affect all that borrow," Small said.

Small said students will have to apply for this payment plan. He thinks some students from ENMU will be eligible.

U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M., said the executive order is an important step for helping students repay loans, according to a press release from Lujan's office.

"A college education unlocks the doors of opportunity and it is critical that more Americans have the chance to get their degree without taking on a mountain of debt -- debt that is currently holding back a generation of Americans and putting a drag on our economy," said Lujan.

According to a White House press release, about two-thirds of college graduates take out loans with students owing an average of more than $23,000 in debt.

LUJAN WRITES TO DOJ ON PROBLEMS WITH VETERANS TREATMENT AT ALBUQUERQUE VA FACILITY

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 391 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

In the letter, Lujan highlights the similarities in problems that have been exposed in Phoenix and in Albuquerque and the fact that DOJ is actively investigating the Phoenix VA facility, and should consider expanding its investigate to Albuquerque if necessary.

Below is the text of the letter:

June 20, 2014

The Honorable Eric Holder

Attorney General

U.S. Department of Justice

950 Pennsylvania Avenue, NW

Washington, DC 20530

Dear General Holder,

Last week, Federal Bureau of Investigation Director James Comey confirmed that the FBI Phoenix Division is actively investigating criminal allegations within the Phoenix Veterans Affairs Health Care System. As you are aware, whistle-blowers within this facility have alleged that VA staff has falsified patient scheduling records in order to make them appear shorter and thus obtain financial performance bonuses. Most troubling, these whistle-blowers believe that a number of veterans have passed away before their first appointment due to these fraudulent scheduling procedures.

Following the revelations at the Phoenix facility, additional whistle-blowers at VA health centers around the nation revealed that the problems at the Phoenix facility were widespread throughout the system. At the Raymond G. Murphy VA Medical Center in Albuquerque, leaked records revealed that more than 1,760 patients who needed a primary care physician were assigned to a medical supervisor who does not treat patients on a "phantom" waiting list. A subsequent audit of this panel revealed that at least 21 of the veterans listed passed away as they awaited medical treatment. In addition, the recent VA national audit found that nearly 3,500 veterans have had to wait more than 30 days for an appointment at this facility.

Due to the similarities in the practices and procedures of the Albuquerque VA Hospital to those in Phoenix, it is my belief that the investigation by the FBI may need to be expanded to include both facilities. I am outraged by the systematic neglect of these veterans by the very health providers who are entrusted with their care, and believe that, should criminal activity be found, it be punished with the fullest extent of the law.

Thank you for your attention to this matter.

Sincerely,

Ben Ray Lujan

Member of Congress

UDALL, HEINRICH, LUJAN ASK FOREST SERVICE TO RESOLVE CONCERNS RAISED BY ACEQUIA ASSOCIATIONS; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 879 words

WASHINGTON - Today, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Representative Ben Ray Lujan sent a letter to U.S. Forest Service (USFS) Chief Thomas Tidwell, asking that he work with them on a collaborative solution to ensure traditional users of Forest Service land can continue to manage and maintain acequias while staying within USFS guidelines.

The lawmakers note in their letter that members of New Mexico's traditional land grants and acequia associations have raised a number of concerns about new USFS requirements, which they say are unnecessarily burdensome and hindering their ability to do routine maintenance and repairs on their systems. The letter specifically mentions a recent dispute between the the Forest Service and the Abeyta-Trujillo Acequia Association near Abiquiu, N.M.

"This apparently new, more inflexible stance from the Forest Service flies in the face of the Service's purported commitment to work more collaboratively with traditional users of the lands, such as land grants and acequias," the lawmakers wrote. "We ask that your office assist in de-escalating the situation and engaging in discussions to find a path forward for reasonable acequia management that will not further strain relationships or lead to litigation."

Acequias, or community ditches, are recognized under New Mexico law as political subdivisions of the state of New Mexico, and many of the state's acequia associations date back to the 17th and 18th centuries. Historically, acequias have served as a primary tool for local governments to distribute and use surface water, and they continue to provide irrigation water for water rights holders. Disputes between acequia associations and the Forest Service have emerged relatively recently, as the Forest Service has required the associations to apply for permits to conduct routine maintenance.

The issue was raised during a meeting earlier this month between members of the congressional delegation staff and the Forest Service. The discussion and recent concerns raised by the acequia associations prompted the lawmakers to seek Tidwell's assistance in finding a permanent resolution.

The full text of the letter is available below and HERE http://www.scribd.com/doc/230252029/June-2014-Letter-to-USFS-Chief-Tidwell:

Thomas L. Tidwell, Chief

U.S. Forest Service

United States Department of Agriculture

1400 Independence Ave., SW

Washington, D.C. 20250-1111

Dear Chief Tidwell:

We write to you to raise concerns about a situation that has come to our attention regarding recent maintenance activities of the Abeyta-Trujillo Acequia Association near Abiquiu, NM. As you know, acequias, or community ditches, are recognized under New Mexico law as political subdivisions of the State of New Mexico. Many of the state's acequia associations have been in existence since the Spanish colonization period of the 17th and 18th centuries, such as the Abeyta-Trujillo Acequia, which was established in 1735. Historically, acequias have been a principal local government unit for the distribution and use of surface water, and they continue to provide irrigation waters for their parciantes, or water rights holders.

It is our understanding that acequias should be able to conduct routine maintenance on these historic channels without unnecessary bureaucratic obstacles such as requiring a new permit every time maintenance is needed. Earlier this month, our offices met with USFS staff to request a facilitated discussion between the Forest Service, the Abeyta-Trujillo Acequia Association, and the New Mexico Acequia Association. The purpose of the discussion has been to clarify any misunderstandings and discuss the conflicting policies regarding the treatment of acequia maintenance. During the meeting with USFS, our staff was informed that the agency had just issued a demand for immediate remediation of recent maintenance activities within the Abeyta-Trujillo ditch. USFS also informed our staff that there would be no facilitated discussion with the Abeyta-Trujillo acequia, and that the agency stands by its demands that if the remediation is not completed by July 7, 2014, the USFS may suspend or revoke the Abeyta-Trujillo Acequia's Special Use Permit.

In recent years, we have received an increasing number of complaints from acequias that need to do routine maintenance and repairs on their system, but that claim the USFS is imposing unnecessarily burdensome requirements. This apparently new, more inflexible stance from the Forest Service flies in the face of the Service's purported commitment to work more collaboratively with traditional users of the lands, such as land grants and acequias. We ask that your office assist in de-escalating the situation and engaging in discussions to find a path forward for reasonable acequia management that will not further strain relationships or lead to litigation.

Thank you for your prompt attention to this matter, and please let us know how we can be of assistance in resolving this issue.

Sincerely,

TOM UDALL

United States Senator

MARTIN HEINRICH

United States Senator

BEN RAY LUJAN

United States Representative

NM delegation finds political lessons in Cantor's loss

BYLINE: MICHAEL COLEMAN Journal Washington Bureau

LENGTH: 789 words

As Virginia voters headed to the polls last Tuesday, House Majority Leader Eric Cantor met with big money donors at a Washington Starbucks in the morning then spent the afternoon shepherding legislation on the House floor, seemingly unaware that his political career was going down in flames.

In hindsight, Cantor no doubt wishes he had spent the day 90 miles south in Richmond where he could have tried to get more voters to the polls. The majority leader's Election Day disconnect and stunning primary election loss to tea party challenger David Brat quickly became a symbol of his larger problem: Losing touch with his district.

It's a lesson all three of New Mexico's U.S. House members say they already know well. Each is back home this weekend in their districts - as they often are - meeting with constituents and keeping a visible profile.

"You better have a relationship," with constituents, Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, a freshman Democrat, told me Thursday. "They need to trust you and know you and see you as someone who represents them at home. This (Cantor loss) is a pretty clear message to members of Congress that that is the number one important thing."

Rep. Steve Pearce, the delegation's only Republican, concurred:

"It looks like Cantor just lost contact with the district. There was some immigration flashback, but it was more that he just wasn't in the district much. I go home a lot for this very reason. Voters can decide overnight 'you haven't been here much - see ya.' You need to be back and working with the people who elected you."

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan echoed his colleague's remarks, saying, "Members need to be back working in their districts."

As a Republican, Pearce is New Mexico's House member most directly affected by the Cantor loss. Pearce was one of just 12 House Republicans who voted against House Speaker John Boehner's bid to retain the speakership at the outset of the 113th Congress, casting his ballot for Cantor instead.

Pearce told the National Journal in 2012 that his vote against Boehner was "probably the most popular vote I've made, in this district." But he downplayed the significance of his vote for Cantor last week.

"It doesn't have much impact that I voted for Mr. Cantor," Pearce said. "I'm pretty well a protocol guy. It wasn't that I was voicing this great contentment with Mr. Cantor; it was instead saying I think we need a pitching change and the next pitcher in the rotation was this guy. Some people will say I was all aligned with Mr. Cantor and in fact, Mr. Cantor and I have crossed swords quite a bit."

While it might not have a seismic impact on Pearce's political standing, Cantor's loss does deprive him of any immediate strong allies in the House GOP leadership structure.

Pearce said he would have liked to have seen Cantor stay on as majority leader through the end of the year to help move legislation he has pending in the House, especially bill to reauthorize the Native American Housing Assistance and Self Determination Act. But instead, Cantor resigned his leadership post effective July 31.

Pearce, who is also the only Republican congressman representing a district on the U.S.-Mexico border, noted that Cantor was trying to thread the needle on immigration and actually get a comprehensive bill completed. Cantor even flirted with the idea of a so-called "path to citizenship" - or amnesty - for children of illegal immigrants who were brought into the country by their parents. In the end, the immigration issue contributed to the majority leader's defeat.

"He was playing footsy with the issue and trying to move it along and keep all the options on the table, but people really do flash when you talk about amnesty," Pearce said. "He got himself into a very difficult messaging situation where he was trying to encourage Republicans to stay on board and keep moving forward but his district was never hearing him say 'amnesty is not the plan and we're not going to do it'. And I think he tried to cure it right at the end but people had already formed an opinion about what he intended. As one of the top three members of the House he has to keep the discussion moving, but he can't move too far from the position of his district."

Lujan said Cantor's lurch to the right on immigration in the closing few weeks of his campaign would have made it hard for the majority leader to come back to Congress and compromise. So, the northern New Mexico Democrat is hopeful that with Cantor gone, immigration reform actually stands a better chance.

"I think it actually improves the opportunity for some kind of piecemeal approach or even a comprehensive bill," Lujan said.

Delegation discusses economic policies; Congress members speak to Chamber

BYLINE: JAMES MONTELEONE JOURNAL STAFF WRITER

SECTION: METRO & NEW MEXICO; Pg. C1

LENGTH: 599 words

New Mexico's delegation to the U.S. House -two Democrats and a Republican - outlined differing perspectives on New Mexico's lagging economy during a panel discussion Friday with Albuquerque business leaders.

In his presentation to the Greater Albuquerque Chamber of Commerce, Democratic Rep. Ben Ray Luján did not mention Republican Gov. Susa-na Martinez by name but took aim at what he characterized as an indecisive state administration. He cited flat-lined job growth while neighboring states have demonstrated economic gains.

While the Martinez administration often has faulted Democratic resistance to change, Republican Rep. Steve Pearce on Friday said the blame falls on a culture of government regulation that risks choking out the entrepreneurial spirit.

"Regulation, taxes (and) uncertainty are probably the three biggest penalties for expansion, growth and job capabilities. ... New Mexico must take a look at what it does in a microcosm of those," said Pearce, the representative of the southern New Mexico 2nd Congressional District.

"Right now it's a very uncertain time, if you look at the Affordable Care Act, if you look at the regulations coming out of the EPA, whatever," Pearce said.

Luján, representing northern New Mexico's 3rd Congressional District, said the Affordable Care Act and EPA regulations have affected other states as well, but other states have managed to create "tens of thousands" of new jobs since the recession. New Mexico, meanwhile, is still working to catch up to the number of jobs in the state before the reces- sion hit.

"What's happening differently in those states than in our state?" Luján asked.

He cited Spaceport America and the film industry as examples in which the state's efforts have not been clear or consistent. The New Mexico film industry in particular lagged after the state backed off its investments, Luján said, prompting the state to reinstate incentives.

"There was no reason for that except for embarrassing politics," Luján said.

Lujan Grisham, central New Mexico's 1st Congressional District representative, took a more middle-of-the-road approach, saying sound government policies are needed to promote business development, such as wider use of public-private partnerships.

"We've got to have the right policies in place that promote businesses. I agree that's something we should be doing. I may not agree that's always tax reform," Lujan Grisham said. "... We have to do a much better job with innovation and entrepreneurship."

The congressional representatives also expressed disagreement about negotiations between the Department of Defense and the Arizona company SunZia to allow an alternative energy transmission line to cross a restricted area north of White Sands Missile Range.

Luján praised the plan recently endorsed by the Obama administration to compromise on Department of Defense concerns by requiring that five miles of the line in the restricted test area be buried.

"There's no question (of) the importance of White Sands, but if we could also support a private investment project in the state that's going to export power and create a revenue stream, it's something that should be considered while we protect our assets," Luján said.

Pearce criticized the "deal" on the SunZia transmission line, saying the project diminishes the unique testing capabilities of the range and threatens to reduce federal appropriations to White Sands that benefit New Mexico.

"To choose an Arizona corporation's profits over national security and New Mexico jobs was the wrong thing," Pearce said. "We're going to contend with it still."

Congressional Votes for New Mexico the Week of 06/06 - 06/12/2014

BYLINE: by TARGETED NEWS SERVICE, Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 3650 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON, June 14 -- There were 12 key votes in the House this week; the House held a total of 41 roll call votes in the week ending Thursday. The Senate held 10 key votes, and 16 roll call votes. The most important House vote was to pass a bill funding the Transportation Department and Housing and Urban Development in fiscal 2015. The most important Senate vote was to pass a bill to reform the Veterans Affairs Department.

Along with roll call votes, the House also passed various legislation by voice vote, including: a resolution (H. Res. 600), sponsored by Rep. Alan Grayson, D-Fla., to urge Afghanistan's government to hold a transparent, secure, and credible presidential election on June 14; the Demanding Accountability for Veterans Act (H.R. 2072), sponsored by Rep. Dan Benishek, R-Mich., to improve the accountability of the Veterans Affairs Secretary to the VA's Inspector General; and the Mortgage Choice Act (H.R. 3211), sponsored by Rep. Bill Huizenga, R-Mich., to improve definitions of the points and fees connected to mortgage transactions included in fee disclosure requirements.

The Senate also passed the Intelligence Authorization Act (H.R. 4681), sponsored by Rep. Mike J. Rogers, R-Mich., to authorize funding for the government's intelligence and intelligence-related activities in fiscal 2014 and fiscal 2015, with the exact funding levels and other details not disclosed to the public.

Here's a look at how area members of Congress voted over the previous week.

HOUSE VOTES:

House Vote 1:

AUTHORIZING SPENDING ON NASA: The House has passed the National Aeronautics and Space Administration Authorization Act (H.R. 4412), sponsored by Rep. Steven M. Palazzo, R-Miss. The bill would authorize $17.6 billion of fiscal 2014 appropriations for NASA, and require NASA to develop a plan for human exploration of outer space, including Mars. Palazzo called the bill "a serious bipartisan commitment to space exploration at a serious time in our nation's history" and an effort to maintain American leadership in space by establishing a clear direction for that effort. The vote, on June 9, was 401 yeas to 2 nays.

House Vote 2:

LIABILITY INSURANCE FOR TRUCKERS: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Steve Daines, R-Mont., to the Transportation, Housing and Urban Development, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act (H.R. 4745). The amendment would bar funding for the Federal Motor Carrier Safety Administration to implement regulations requiring truck and bus companies to carry an increased amount of liability insurance. Daines said the current $750,000 liability insurance requirement was adequate, and "there is no evidence supporting higher insurance requirements or that coverage levels result in the improved safety performance of a motor carrier." An ame

House Vote 3:

RULES FOR HUD GRANTS: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Paul A. Gosar, R-Ariz., to the Transportation, Housing and Urban Development, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act (H.R. 4745). The amendment would bar funding for the Housing and Urban Development Department to implement its proposed rule, Affirmatively Furthering Fair Housing, which would impose racial composition and income zoning requirements on communities seeking block grants from HUD. Gosar said the rule would give HUD too much power over local zoning decisions, impose impractical and unrealistic requirements for the demographics of public housing and "increase local taxes, depress property values, and cause further harm to impoverished communities that are actually in need of these funds." An amendment opponent, Rep. Ed Pastor, D-Ariz., said the rule "simply provides communities with more data to comply with their existing duties" set out by the Fair Housing Act. The vote, on June 10, was 219 yeas to 207 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 4:

LICENSE PLATE CAMERAS: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. John Fleming, R-La., to the Transportation, Housing and Urban Development, and Related Agencies Appropriations

Act (H.R. 4745). The amendment would bar funding for the purchase of cameras that can automatically collect and store the license plate numbers of ordinary drivers. Fleming said given the ability of the cameras to expand government monitoring of citizens, taxpayers in states that have rejected the license plate cameras should not have to subsidize the use of the cameras in other parts of the country. An amendment opponent, Rep. Tom Latham, R-Iowa, said it could have the unintended consequence of banning agencies from buying cameras for purposes such as airport security monitoring because the cameras could theoretically be used to capture license plate numbers. The vote, on June 10, was 255 yeas to 171 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 5:

ALTERNATIVES TO VA MEDICAL CARE: The House has passed the Veteran Access to Care Act (H.R. 4810), sponsored by Rep. Jeff Miller, R-Fla. The bill would have the Veterans Affairs Department reach contracts with non-VA facilities to provide medical services as necessary to veterans who live more than 40 miles from the nearest VA facility and have not received timely care at VA facilities. Miller said the change would help resolve a national emergency in which more than 57,000 veterans in the VA's health care system are waiting for initial appointments for treatment. Miller added that the bill would "assure that veterans waiting for an appointment or residing far from VA medical facilities are left in the control of their own care and able to choose for themselves where, when, and how they receive the care that the veteran themselves need." The vote, on June 10, was unanimous with 426 yeas.

House Vote 6:

CALIFORNIA HIGH-SPEED RAIL PROJECT: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Jeff Denham, R-Calif., to the Transportation, Housing and Urban Development, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act (H.R. 4745). The amendment would bar funding for the construction of high-speed rail in California. Denham said the state's high-speed rail project has been halted by judicial rulings and faces cost overruns and mismanagement, and so the federal government should not continue to provide funding. An amendment opponent, Rep. Zoe Lofgren, D-Calif., said "high-speed rail is the most effective and environmentally sustainable way to increase mobility across" California. The vote, on June 10, was 227 yeas to 186 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 7:

FUNDING HUD, TRANSPORTATION DEPARTMENT: The House has passed the Transportation, Housing and Urban Development, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act (H.R. 4745), sponsored by Rep. Tom Latham, R-Iowa. The bill would provide $57 billion of funding for the Transportation Department and Housing and Urban Development Department in fiscal 2015. The related agencies include Amtrak, the Federal Maritime Commission, National Transportation Safety Board, U.S. Interagency Council on Homelessness, and Neighborhood Reinvestment Corporation. Latham said the bill maintained budgetary discipline while providing necessary services, such as air traffic control monitoring and housing for families in need. A bill opponent, Rep. Nita Lowey, D-N.Y., said it "provides inadequate funding for our country's highway and transit infrastructure," including a $200-million cut in Amtrak's capital budget and less funding for capital investment in public transit projects and affordable housing. The vote, on June 10, was 229 yeas to 192 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 8:

PURCHASING FOOD AID SUPPLIES: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Edward R. Royce, R-Calif., to the Agriculture, Rural Development, Food and Drug Administration, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act (H.R. 4800). The amendment would increase funding for the Foreign Agricultural Service, which provides food aid overseas, by $10 million and cut funding for the Agricultural Market Service, which markets and promotes food products, by $15.5 million. Royce said the funding increase would enable the purchase of food in locations that are close to regions with an urgent need for food supplies to relieve famine, with a resulting reduction in the cost and time required to deliver food to famine victims. An amendment opponent, Rep. Stephen Lee Fincher, R-Tenn., said it would redirect taxpayer dollars from domestic farmers to foreign farmers, and food aid funds should be spent on domestic food supplies in order to support "American agriculture, exports, and jobs while increasing goodwill overseas and helping those in need." The vote, on June 11, was 223 yeas to 198 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

NAYS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 9:

WATER CONSERVATION AND DROUGHT: The House has rejected an amendment sponsored by Rep. John Garamendi, D-Calif., to the Agriculture, Rural Development, Food and Drug Administration, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act (H.R. 4800). The amendment would have allocated $50 million of Farm Service Agency funds at the Agriculture Department to emergency water conservation programs in California and other states suffering from drought. Garamendi said the funding would allow for the use of new water-conserving technologies that can help farmers in afflicted states save orchards and other crops that would otherwise die off for lack of water. An amendment opponent, Rep. Robert B. Aderholt, R-Ala., said the cut in Farm Service Agency funds would case agency offices around the country to shut down, reducing an important source of local support for farmers and ranchers. The vote, on June 11, was 148 yeas to 276 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

NAYS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 10:

BUSINESS TAX EXPENSING ALLOWANCE: The House has passed the America's Small Business Tax Relief Act (H.R. 4457), sponsored by Rep. Patrick J. Tiberi, R-Ohio. The bill would make the tax code's $500,000 expensing allowance for depreciable business property permanent, and adjust the expensing allowance for inflation in years after 2014. Tiberi said changing the expensive allowance from a temporary to a permanent part of the tax code would give business owners the certainty they need to make investments. A bill opponent, Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, D-Md., said the bill would add to the deficit by cutting tax revenue, and Hoyer added that it was a piecemeal substitute for the comprehensive tax reform that Congress should be working on to put the government's budget on solid footing and make investments in education, infrastructure, and economic growth. The vote, on June 12, was 272 yeas to 144 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 11:

TAXING ASSET SALES BY S CORPORATIONS: The House has passed the Permanent S Corporation Built-in Gains Recognition Period Act (H.R. 4453), sponsored by Rep. David G. Reichert, R-Wash. The bill would modify the tax code to permanently cut the period during which built-in gains from asset sales by S corporations after they have converted from C corporation status are taxable from 10 years to 5 years. Reichert said making the 5-year period permanent would encourage S corporations with aging or unproductive assets to sell those assets and use the proceeds to fund new investments, and also allow other businesses to buy the used assets for their own use. A bill opponent, Rep. Sander M. Levin, D-Mich., said the bill did not replace the loss of tax revenue with offsetting sources of new revenue, and therefore would irresponsibly add to the deficit. The vote, on June 12, was 263 yeas to 155 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 12:

CONDEMNING BOKO HARAM: The House has passed a resolution (H. Res. 617), sponsored by Rep. Frederica S. Wilson, R-Fla., to condemn Boko Haram's ongoing abduction of hundreds of girl student in the northeastern part of Nigeria, as well as other recent violent actions by Boko Haram, and call on President Obama to submit to Congress a strategy to combat Boko Haram and other radical Islamist terrorist groups in Africa. Wilson said the Boko Haram kidnapping was one of many instances of radical Islamic groups attacking girls who seek an education, and "we must continue to do everything we can to bring back these young girls" in Nigeria. The vote, on June 12, was 411 yeas to 2 nays.

SENATE VOTES:

Senate Vote 1:

VIRGINIA DISTRICT JUDGE: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of M. Hannah Lauck to serve as a judge on the U.S. District Court for the Eastern District of Virginia. A supporter, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy, D-Vt., cited Lauck's nine years of experience as a magistrate judge in the court and decade of previous experience as an assistant U.S. attorney in the Eastern District of Virginia, as well as her well-qualified rating from the American Bar Association. The vote, on June 10, was unanimous with 90 yeas.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 2:

MASSACHUSETTS DISTRICT JUDGE: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Leo T. Sorokin to serve as a judge on the U.S. District Court for the District of Massachusetts. A supporter, Senate Judiciary Committee Chairman Patrick J. Leahy, D-Vt., cited Sorokin's nine years of experience as magistrate judge in the court, including service as chief magistrate judge for the past two years, eight previous years of work as an assistant public defender in the federal courts, and well-qualified rating from the American Bar Association. The vote, on June 10, was unanimous with 91 yeas.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 3:

NEVADA DISTRICT JUDGE: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Richard Franklin Boulware II to serve as a judge on the U.S. District Court for the District of Nevada. A supporter, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, D-Nevada, said Boulware, who has been a public defender in the federal courts in Nevada and New York for the past decade, and before that a lawyer at a private law firm, "has impeccable credentials." An opponent, Sen. Chuck Grassley, R-Iowa, cited Boulware's partially not qualified rating from the American Bar Association, his experience only in criminal law, and his 12 years of experience in the law as having inadequately prepared him to be a judge. Grassley said: "When I consider the entirety of his record, his lack of experience as an attorney and his zealous advocacy for many controversial policy positions, it is with reluctance that I will vote no on his nomination." The vote, on June 10, was 58 yeas to 35 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 4:

INTEREST ON STUDENT LOANS: The Senate has rejected a cloture motion to end debate on the Bank on Students Emergency Loan Refinancing Act (S. 2432), sponsored by Sen. Elizabeth Warren, D-Mass. The bill would have directed the Education Secretary to establish a program for refinancing federal student loans and penalties on the loans, and fixed the interest rate on the refinanced loans for the duration of the loans. Warren said graduates were suffering the consequences of artificially high interest rates on their student loans, and the resulting burden "is keeping many young people from moving out of their parents' homes, from saving for a down payment, from buying homes, buying cars, starting small businesses, saving for retirement, or making the purchases that grow our economy." An opponent of ending debate, Sen. Marco Rubio, R-Fla., said Democrats had advanced the bill prematurely, from political motives rather than from a desire to solve underlying problems in the system of higher education. The vote to end debate, on June 11, was 56 yeas to 38 nays, with a three-fifths majority required to end debate.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 5:

POINT OF ORDER ON VA REFORM BILL: The Senate has waived a budget point of order raised by Sen. Jeff Sessions, R-Ala., against the Veterans' Access to Care through Choice, Accountability, and Transparency Act (H.R. 3230). Sessions said the bill authorized an unlimited amount of spending to reform the Veterans Affairs Department and put the spending on an emergency basis, so rather than pay for the spending by cutting waste elsewhere in the budget, the bill would enable more spending with little oversight or accountability. An opponent of the point of order, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said: "This is an emergency. If it is not an emergency that we have neglected the brave men and women who have served this country and keep us free, than I do not know what an emergency is." The vote to waive the point of order, on June 11, was 75 yeas to 19 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 6:

REFORMING THE VA: The Senate has passed the Veterans' Access to Care through Choice, Accountability, and Transparency Act (H.R. 3230), sponsored by Rep. Harold Rogers, R-Ky. The bill would authorize the Veterans Affairs Secretary to fire senior officials at the VA and have the VA reach contracts with non-VA facilities to provide medical services as necessary to veterans who live more than 40 miles from the nearest VA facility and have not received timely care at VA facilities. A supporter, Sen. Jon Tester, D-Mont., said: "By getting rid of incentives to falsify wait times and make it easier to remove bad managers, we will hold more folks accountable for the care veterans receive. By making it easier to hire medical professionals and allowing more veterans to seek care from outside providers, we will reduce the bottleneck that forces veterans to wait too long for care." The vote, on June 11, was 93 yeas to 3 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 7:

AMBASSADOR TO UNESCO: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Crystal Nix-Hines to serve as the U.S. Permanent Representative to the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO). No supporters of the nomination spoke on the Senate floor. An opponent, Sen. Dan Coats, R-Ind., criticized Nix-Hines for supporting the Palestinian Authority's membership in UNESCO, which, Coats said, has hurt prospects for reaching a peace settlement in the Middle East by encouraging Palestinian efforts to achieve recognition as a state by appealing directly to the U.N. rather than through negotiations with Israel. Coats added that U.S. law states that the government "will not support any agency that acknowledges and admits Palestine as a recognized state," but Nix-Hines and the Obama administration sought a waiver from the law in the UNESCO case. The vote, on June 12, was 52 yeas to 41 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 8:

FIRST FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD MEMBER: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Lael Brainard to serve as a member of the Federal Reserve System's board of governors for a 14-year term that began on Feb. 1, 2012. A supporter, Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., cited Brainard's experience as Under Secretary for International Affairs at the Treasury Department for the last four years and prior experience as Deputy Director of the National Economic Council and vice president of the Brookings Institution. The vote, on June 12, was 61 yeas to 31 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 9:

SECOND FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD MEMBER: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Jerome H. Powell to serve as a member of the Federal Reserve System's board of governors for a 14-year term that began on Feb. 1, 2014. A supporter, Sen. Tim Johnson, D-S.D., cited Powell's two years of current service on the Fed's board and previous experience as a Treasury Department official during the George H.W. Bush administration. The vote, on June 12, was 67 yeas to 24 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 10:

VICE CHAIR OF FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Stanley Fischer to serve as Vice Chairman of the Board of Governors of the Federal Reserve System for a four-year term. A supporter, Sen. Mary Landrieu, D-La., said Fischer, who would replace Janet Yellen as Vice Chairman, had extensive experience as chief economist at the World Bank, second-ranking official at the International Monetary Fund, vice president of Citigroup and, most recently, nine years as governor of the Bank of Israel. Landrieu said: "His extensive policymaking experience and expertise make him uniquely qualified to serve in the Fed's number two position and navigate the challenges we face as our economy continues to recover from the worst recession since the Great Depression." The vote, on June 12, was 63 yeas to 24 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

NM delegation pushes for photonics hub

BYLINE: Gary Gerew

LENGTH: 269 words

Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, along with Reps. Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Luján and Michelle Lujan Grisham, have sent a letter to Secretary of Defense Chuck Hagel urging his department to consider an advanced photonics manufacturing hub as it selects the technical focus area for its next manufacturing institute.

"We believe the potential for advanced photonics is enormous and the United States is well positioned to capture both the strategic military value of photonics and the economic benefits of a growing industry," the delegation members wrote. "In New Mexico, the business community, along with the scientific and military community, have already begun to reap the benefits of advanced photonics, and increased investment will only see the dividends provided to the country increase as a result," the delegation wrote.

The Obama Administration launched an initiative in 2013 to create a network of institutes across the country designed to bring together applied research and product development.

In March, the delegation and members of public private partnerships said New Mexico's extensive expertise made it a "natural location" for additional national investment in research and manufacturing of optics and photonics technologies, which are used in robotics, medical imaging, next-generation displays, defense, biometric security and many other fields.

N.M. Delegation Requests DOD Support for Development of Advanced Photonics Manufacturing Hub; Sen. Tom Udall (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. SENATE DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 1106 words

WASHINGTON - U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Reps. Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham wrote a letter to Secretary of Defense Chuck Hagel underlining their strong support for the Department of Defense's (DoD) manufacturing innovation institute competition, and requesting the DoD choose the development of an advanced photonics manufacturing hub in the United States as they select the technical focus area of their next manufacturing institute.

In the letter, the lawmakers wrote, "Manufacturing in advanced photonics should be a priority for the United States given the technological solutions it can provide for national security, and the economic benefit it will provide to a number of industries. These technologies should be developed and manufactured in the United States, not abroad."

The administration launched an initiative in 2013 to create a network of manufacturing innovation institutes across the country, which would serve as regional hubs to bridge the gap between applied research and product development. By bringing together companies, universities, and federal agencies, the nation can invest in the production of key technologies, such as advanced photonics, and encourage investment and production in the U.S. A recent DoD request for information from industry and academia indicated photonics as one of the technical focus areas currently under consideration for future institutes for manufacturing innovation.

New Mexico is uniquely positioned as a leader in optics and photonics capabilities, which are critical across a broad spectrum of commercial and defense industries. In March, the delegation and members of public private partnerships indicated that New Mexico's extensive expertise makes it a natural location for additional national investment in research and manufacturing of optics and photonics technologies, which are used in robotics, medical imaging, next-generation displays, defense, biometric security and many other fields.

"We believe the potential for advanced photonics is enormous and the United States is well positioned to capture both the strategic military value of photonics and the economic benefits of a growing industry. In New Mexico, the business community, along with the scientific and military community, have already begun to reap the benefits of advanced photonics, and increased investment will only see the dividends provided to the country increase as a result," the delegation wrote.

"We hope the DoD will give advanced photonics its sincere consideration as the next manufacturing innovation institute," the letter concludes.

June 6, 2014

The Honorable Chuck Hagel

Secretary of Defense

U.S. Department of Defense

1000 Defense Pentagon

Washington, DC 20301-1000

Dear Secretary Hagel:

We write in strong support of the Department of Defense's (DoD) manufacturing innovation institute competition and respectfully request that DoD support the development of an advanced photonics manufacturing hub in the United States.

As you know, the manufacturing innovation institute competition will allow for the establishment of public/private manufacturing hubs to bridge the gap between applied research and product development. By bringing together companies, universities, and federal agencies, our nation can co-invest in areas that encourage investment and production of key technologies in the United States such as advanced photonics.

The significance of photonics is increasingly recognized in a number of forums. In 2012, the National Academies National Research Council released a noteworthy report, "Optics and Photonics, Essential Technologies for Our Nation," which emphasized the importance of this technology, and on a global scale, the United Nations proclaimed 2015 as the International Year of Light and Light-based Technologies.

Manufacturing in advanced photonics should be a priority for the United States given the technological solutions it can provide for national security, and the economic benefit it will provide to a number of industries. These technologies should be developed and manufactured in the United States, not abroad. The modern technology surrounding us today - phones, computers, televisions - and the communications technologies that enable these devices to function are all made possible largely by optics and photonics. Other technologies benefit from optics and photonics as well, including advanced manufacturing, robotics, medical imaging, next-generation displays, defense technologies, biometric security, image processing, communications, and many others.

Further research and manufacturing of optics and photonics will benefit U.S. national security, enabling greater advances in defense technologies that improve intelligence capabilities for the warfighter such as the capture of spectral signals from space, and the development of directed energy weapons. These signals technologies are vital for information gathering, data transfer, and even provide non-kinetic military solutions to minimize civilian casualties. Photonics research will lead to improved night vision capabilities and advanced infrared counter measures, increasing the tools available to the warfigher. Photonic technology developed for defense purposes will also serve a dual commercial purpose, enabling advances in image processing, more effective non-invasive health screenings, robotics, and improved sensors for first responders.

We believe the potential for advanced photonics is enormous and the United States is well positioned to capture both the strategic military value of photonics and the economic benefits of a growing industry. In New Mexico, the business community, along with the scientific and military community have already begun to reap the benefits of advanced photonics, and increased investment will only see the dividends provided to the country increase as a result.

Thank you for your leadership in conducting the manufacturing innovation institute competition. We hope the DoD will give advanced photonics its sincere consideration as the next manufacturing innovation institute.

TOM UDALL

LUJAN: PRESIDENT'S ACTIONS ON STUDENT LOAN DEBT AN IMPORTANT STEP; TIME FOR CONGRESS TO ACT

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 409 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, D.C.

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District highlighted an executive order signed by President Obama today that takes aim at the growing burden of student loan debt on young Americans. The action will create a new "Pay As You Earn" option for 5 million federal direct student loan borrowers, enabling them to cap their student loan repayments at 10 percent of their income. It will also promote awareness of repayment options and improve outreach to vulnerable borrowers and improve the information available to students and families. Lujan called the President's efforts an important step and called on Congress to take action that will further help millions of people facing tens of thousands of dollars in student loans debt.

"With college costs rising and more and more students and their families taking on debt to afford a college education, we need to address this serious issue," Congressman Lujan said. "President Obama's executive order will help borrowers by capping repayments and promoting awareness of repayment options, but it is no replacement for Congressional action. Today, I am cosponsoring legislation that would allow millions of borrowers to refinance their existing student loans at lower rates. A college education unlocks the doors of opportunity and it is critical that more Americans have the chance to get their degree without taking on a mountain of debt - debt that is currently holding back a generation of Americans and putting a drag on our economy."

Lujan signed on to the Bank on Students Emergency Loan Refinancing Act, which allows federal and private student loan borrowers to refinance their loans at rates currently available to those taking out new federal student loans. Borrowers who are stuck with high interest rates can refinance loans for undergraduate education at 3.86 percent and loans for graduate education at 5.41 percent. A middle-class graduate who borrowed the national average of $30,000 for their undergraduate education could save more than $4,000 in interest payments over the life of the loan.

Currently in New Mexico 234,000 borrowers face $5.3 billion in outstanding student loan debt. The Bank on Students Emergency Loan Refinancing Act, along with President Obama's executive action, would help address $1.2 trillion in student loans debt nationally, saving families across the country $70 billion.

LUJAN STATEMENT ON INTERNAL VA AUDIT SHOWING LONG WAIT TIMES FOR VETERANS SEEKING MEDICAL CARE

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 163 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON, D.C.

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on the release of a Department of Veterans Affairs audit showing that nearly 3,500 veterans have had to wait more than 30 days for an appointment at the VA facility in Albuquerque.

"Today's VA report is deeply disappointing and confirms what we have been hearing from too many veterans in New Mexico. The wait times for veterans seeking the care they have earned is simply too long. The systemic problems that have plagued Albuquerque's VA facility, along with VA facilities across the country, must be addressed swiftly and thoroughly. It is simply unacceptable that in New Mexico new patients have to wait on average 45 days for primary care and 57 days for specialty care. Our brave veterans deserve better and I will continue to fight on their behalf as Congress addresses this critical issue."

LUJAN REQUESTS VA AUDIT OF CURRENT AND PAST CASEWORK THAT COULD HAVE BEEN IMPACTED BY VA MISCONDUCT; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 745 words

Santa Fe, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District sent letters today to Acting Secretary of the Department of Veterans Affairs Sloan Gibson and Dr. James Robbins, Interim Director of the New Mexico VA Health Care System, requesting that the VA audit casework conducted by Lujan's office on behalf of veterans in the district. As a result of recent reports that as many as 3,000 New Mexico veterans were placed on a separate waiting list that resulted in significant delays to receive care, Lujan is asking VA officials to review casework that is currently open to determine if the problems plaguing the VA system have impacted these cases. His office is also in the process of reviewing years of past casework that have been closed for any cases in which misconduct by the VA could have played a role in the decisions against his constituents.

"I have serious concerns that the deplorable actions in the Phoenix Health Care System are widespread within the VA system and that Veterans in New Mexico have been impacted by gross misconduct," Congressman Lujan wrote in the letter. "Therefore, I am formally requesting an audit on all casework concerning the VA that is currently open with my office. In addition, as my office continues to review casework that has been closed in the past, I also request an audit of questionable cases we discover."

During his time serving the Third District, Lujan and his staff have assisted hundreds of veterans who have had difficulty working with the VA, from getting benefits to complaints about long wait times for medical care.

"Constituent service is a top priority and we have had success getting veterans the benefits they have earned with their brave service," Lujan said. "However, not every case has resulted in a favorable outcome. If any of these decisions were a result of the gross misconduct that has taken place within the VA system, we need to know and these cases need to be revisited as part of the VA's efforts to address improper actions that have taken place."

"I encourage any veteran who feels that they have been mistreated by the VA to contact my office and share their story," added Lujan. "Hearing directly from those impacted by this misconduct will contribute to efforts to get to the bottom of this and ensure that proper changes are made to the VA so that our veterans receive the care they deserve."

Below is the text of Lujan's letter to the VA:

June 5, 2014

The Honorable Sloan D. Gibson

Acting Secretary

U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs

810 Vermont Ave. N.W.

Washington, DC 20420

Dear Secretary Gibson:

Like many of my constituents, I was outraged to see the recently released interim report published by the Office of Inspector General (OIG) regarding the investigation of the Phoenix Health Care System where 1,700 veterans were omitted from within the VA Electronic Waiting List (EWL). Accusations of similar practices have emerged from within the VA system in Albuquerque, New Mexico where there were alleged efforts to disguise high patient demand at the VA, where as many as 3,000 patients who needed a primary care physician were placed in a "phantom" panel.

In light of the report by the OIG, as well as claims arising out of the New Mexico VA, our office is now reviewing our past and present Veterans health care casework to determine if any cases that did not result in a favorable outcome were due to problems discovered within the VA. I have serious concerns that the deplorable actions in the Phoenix Health Care System are widespread within the VA system and that Veterans in New Mexico have been impacted by gross misconduct. Therefore, I am formally requesting an audit on all casework concerning the VA that is currently open with my office. In addition, as my office continues to review casework that has been closed in the past, I also request an audit of questionable cases we discover.

It is essential that the VA act immediately to address any improper actions that have taken place and ensure that our veterans are receiving the care they deserve. Thank you for your attention to this matter and please keep me apprised of all findings and developments regarding this important issue.

Sincerely,

Ben Ray Lujan

Weh wins GOP nomination for US Senate

BYLINE: JERI CLAUSING, Associated Press

SECTION: POLITICAL NEWS; STATE AND REGIONAL

LENGTH: 635 words

DATELINE: ALBUQUERQUE, N.M.

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) - Retired Marine Col. Allen Weh on Tuesday easily defeated political newcomer David Clements for the unlikely chance to unseat popular Democratic Sen. Tom Udall in November.

The 71-year-old Weh had 64 percent of the vote in unofficial returns from the GOP primary.

A wealthy Albuquerque businessman, Weh spent more than $200,000 of his own money against Clements, a political newcomer with little cash who surprised many by winning 47 percent of delegate support at the state convention earlier this year.

Weh is a former state GOP party chairman who made a run for governor four years ago, coming in second behind Gov. Susana Martinez in a five-way primary.

But despite his veteran status and deep pockets, political watchers have said the GOP has little chance of winning over Udall, a popular former congressman and state attorney general with $3 million cash on hand.

A recent computer model of races conducted for The New York Times says Udall is one of 14 Senate incumbents with a 99 percent chance of retaining their seats. University of New Mexico political science professor Gabriel Sanchez noted that Udall has high approval ratings that will make it difficult for any GOP contender to raise money.

Weh, however, insisted those behind the predictions "just don't understand."

"Things are changing," he said Tuesday night from his election headquarters. "They are going to change this year. And my message is real simple: If you like what's going on in Washington, send Tom Udall back. But if you don't like what's going on, you've got to change the people."

Part of Weh's campaign has been to stress the need for more military veterans over lawyers in the Senate, especially in light of the recent revelations of secret waiting lists and delayed care at Veterans Affairs medical centers around the country. Udall is an attorney.

Weh served two tours in the Vietnam War in the Marines before rising to the rank of colonel and retiring in 1997. He also served in the Persian Gulf War and in Somalia.

On Tuesday night, Weh seized on the Republican anger over the Obama Administration's exchange of five high-level Taliban detainees for Sgt. Bowe Bergdahl, a young soldier who walked away from his unit in the mountains of eastern Afghanistan and into five years of captivity by the Taliban.

"I cannot believe what the administration has done in exchanging five hardened killers for what now appears to be an Army deserter," Weh said. "... That's ludicrous. That puts a target on the back and a prison value on the back of every American serviceman and woman serving overseas, every CIA agent, every foreign service officer."

Weh joined the race in January and has raised nearly $600,000, including $217,000 of his own money, according to the latest reports. Clements, an attorney from Las Cruces, started his grass-roots campaign in November, raising and spending about $40,000, the last filings showed.

In other primary races, two political newcomers were vying for the Republican nomination for the 1st Congressional District seat currently held by Democrat Michelle Lujan Grisham.

Mike Frese, a 66-year-old scientist and small business owner from Corrales, defeated Richard Priem, a 64-year-old businessman and retired Army veteran from Albuquerque, with 65 percent of the vote.

For the 2nd Congressional seat, Democratic three-term incumbent Rep. Ben Ray Lujan easily defeated challenger Robert Blanch, an assistant district attorney in Albuquerque, with 87 percent in unofficial returns.

Lujan will face Republican Jefferson Byrd of Tucumcari for a second time in November.

There were no primary races for southern New Mexico's 3rd Congressional District seat currently held by Republican Steve Pearce, who will run against Democratic attorney Roxanne "Rocky" Laura from Carlsbad in November.

WASHINGTON - Today, U.S. Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, and U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan issued the following statements celebrating the life and service of Chester Nez, the last of the original 29 Navajo Code Talkers, who died Wednesday morning, and honoring the historic role the Native American Code Talkers played in the Allied victory in World War II.

"The passing of Chester Nez is a solemn moment for the Navajo Nation, the state of New Mexico and our country, and my thoughts are with the Nez family," Udall said. "Like the code that helped win two world wars, Chester Nez's commitment to the United States was unbroken. He loved his culture and his country, and when called, he fought to protect both. And because of his service, we enjoy freedoms that have stood the test of time. As we mark Chester's passing, let us honor his memory with a renewed inspiration to preserve our Native languages, and rededicate ourselves to keeping alive the story of our Code Talkers and the patriotic spirit that has always run deep in New Mexico and our nation."

"Chester Nez was a true American hero. His bravery and service will always be remembered," Heinrich said. "Chester, along with 28 other Navajo Code Talkers, used their Native language to develop what would become one of the most indispensable tools in World War II. Serving as a Marine at a young age, Chester's love of country and his commitment to freedom never wavered--neither did his courage. Our nation is forever in his debt. I join all New Mexicans in keeping Chester's family and friends in our thoughts and prayers."

"My thoughts are with the Nez family as we mourn the loss of the last original Navajo Code Talker, Chester Nez. Mr. Nez grew up at a time when speaking his native Navajo was prohibited and punished, yet it did not stop him from holding on to his culture and keeping his language alive," Lujan said. "While Mr. Nez has been described as a traditionally modest and humble man who did not talk a lot, he always sought to preserve his language, and helped share the stories of the Code Talkers with younger generations of Navajos so they understand the importance of their language and are encouraged to learn it. While we are saddened by the loss of Chester Nez, we are inspired by his service to our nation and the efforts of all Navajo Code Talkers who played a critical role in World War II. We thank them for their service."

Hunt is on for elusive voters; NM has history of low primary turnout

BYLINE: James Monteleone Journal Staff Writer

SECTION: FRONT PAGE; Pg. A1

LENGTH: 958 words

New Mexico primary election candidates are making their final pitches before polling places open Tuesday, with ballots running from U.S. Senate and governor nominations to county sheriff.

But the biggest challenge for candidates might be inspiring voters to get out and participate.

Turnout questions stem from an unusually quiet primary election season that didn't seem to generate much voter excitement.

Top incumbents like Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., and Republican Gov. Susana Martinez are unopposed in their primary bids for re-election. Even the five-way contest for the Democratic governor nomination - the party's nod to take on Martinez for the November general election - was a collection of largely unfamiliar faces and first-time candidates for statewide office. And the Democrats for the most part refrained from engaging one another in debate, uniformly aiming their criticism at Martinez.

Meanwhile, television ads in advance of the primary have been few and far between.

The state's closed primary system, meaning only Democrats and Republicans are eligible to vote, shuts out roughly 22 percent of all voters and specifically those who decline to state a party affiliation or who are registered with a minor party.

The heavier action seems to lie ahead in the general election, and many voters may prefer to sit out the preliminaries in Tuesday's election, according to several New Mexico political pundits.

Early voting turnout

Turnout indications from early, in-person voting were mixed.

Early voting was open around the state through Saturday. In at least one of the state's largest counties, Santa Fe, fewer early voting ballots were cast this year than in the 2010 primary election - the last time New Mexico voters considered candidates for governor.

In Santa Fe County, early voting was down about 7 percent from 2010. About 5,100 early ballots were cast, according to Santa Fe County Clerk Geraldine Salazar. In 2010, more than 5,500 Santa Fe voters cast their ballots early.

In Bernalillo County, however, early voting was up slightly over the 2010 primary.

After trailing behind 2010 early voting numbers for most of the early voting period, a surge of voters turned out to cast ballots on Friday and Saturday, raising the county's total early voting numbers to 6 percent higher than the 2010 primary, Bernalillo County Clerk Maggie Toulouse Oliver said. Nearly 22,500 Bernalillo County voters voted early, compared with about 21,100 early primary votes in 2010, according to the county clerk's office.

Democratic

governor's race "Let's face it: If this was a more exciting race, then we'd probably see higher turnout levels," said political analyst Brian Sanderoff, president of Research & Polling Inc.

In the Democratic governor's race, many voters were still undecided in late May among the five candidates - Gary King, Linda Lopez, Howie Morales, Lawrence Rael and Alan Webber. A statewide Journal Poll conducted May 20-22 found that 29 percent of voters remained undecided, more than the number backing any single candidate.

That indecision may cause previously active voters to wait and see who the nominee will be rather than cast a vote, Sanderoff said.

"If they're still undecided, frankly, a lot of those people aren't going to vote," Sanderoff said. "If they're undecided, what's the motivation to vote other than habit?"

UNM political science professor Gabriel Sanchez said he would be surprised if primary voter turnout exceeded 20 percent of the electorate eligible to vote in Tuesday's election.

New Mexico has historically experienced primary election turnouts around 25 percent.

"A lot of people may think, 'Hey, is this even worth paying attention to?'" Sanchez said.

Also, voter doubts about the Democratic candidates' ability to beat Martinez, who is well-funded and presumed to be popular, could be adding to voter inattention, Sanchez said.

"It sends a signal to a lot of voters that these folks might not be able to be competitive with the governor, so is it worth investing in the campaign?" Sanchez said, referring to the perceived quiet of the Democratic primary election campaign for governor. "That really has a lot to do with it."

The ballot

Offices on Tuesday's primary election ballots include: One of the few heated contests has been for the Democratic nomination for state treasurer. Democrats are choosing between former state Sen. Tim Eichenberg and former Democratic Party Chairman John Wertheim. Republican Rick J. Lopez is unopposed for treasurer in the Republican primary.

U.S. Sen. Tom Udall has no Democratic primary challenger. Udall will face the winner of the Republican U.S. Senate primary race between Albuquerque businessman and retired Marine colonel Allen Weh and former Doña Ana County assistant district attorney David Clements.

For the state's three U.S. House seats, Rep. Ben Ray Luján of the 3rd Congressional District is the only incumbent facing a primary challenge. Luján has ballot opposition from former Bernalillo County assistant district attorney Robert Blanch in Tuesday's primary.

For the 1st Congressional District seat, Republicans Mike Frese and Richard Priem are running for their party's nomination to challenge Democratic Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham in November.

There are no contested primaries in the 2nd Congressional District. Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., will face Democrat Roxanne "Rocky" Lara of Carlsbad in the general election.

Eighteen of the state's 70 House seats in the state Legislature are contested in Democratic or Republican primary races. The state Senate is not up for election this year. What you need to know

VA patients in ABQ parked in 'phantom' panel; NM delegation calls for Shinseki's ouster

BYLINE: Colleen Heild and Michael Coleman Journal Staff Writers

LENGTH: 1083 words

New Mexico's congressional delegation joined the cry Thursday for Veterans Affairs Secretary Eric Shinseki to resign over revelations that VA medical centers have doctored patient appointment records to hide long patient waits.

Meanwhile, VA records obtained by the Journal show that efforts to disguise high patient demand at the VA in Albuquerque included putting more than 1,760 patients who needed a primary care physician in a "phantom" panel that was assigned to a medical supervisor who didn't actually treat patients.

The computer record shows the patients were parked there - making it appear they had a doctor - until they could be placed with a primary care physician.

Urgent needs were met by sending the patients to a walk-in clinic, emergency room or squeezing them into the schedule of a physician who was seeing patients.

Manipulation of patient appointment records has been a long-standing problem within the VA, with VA inspector general records showing investigations of the practice at medical centers around the country dating back to at least 2005.

But the Journal also learned that during an internal meeting last fall at the Albuquerque VA medical center, a group that included VA schedulers and their supervisors was instructed to follow "new ways" of making appointments for patients.

There was no overt mention of hiding backlogs, but the change was explained as a way of managing the influx of patients.

One of the "new ways" was to alter the "desired date" of appointment in the internal computer system. The change would make it appear that a patient was being seen within the two-week time frame set up by the VA nationally as a target its medical centers ought to achieve - even though the wait times for the appointments could be months.

An alternative was to offer patients an appointment three or four months in advance, and once a patient agreed, the scheduler was to record that advanced date as the patient's "desired date."

VA performance measures set up in 2012 call for patients to be seen with 14 days of their desired date, and executive bonuses have been based in part on how well their medical centers achieve those performance measures.

Calls to resign

In Washington and elsewhere, the drumbeat grew louder Thursday for a major shake-up at the VA.

New Mexico's two Democratic senators, Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich, called early in the day for Shinseki to step down. Their statements followed a preliminary report that focused on the Phoenix VA medical center, where at least 1,700 veterans waiting for health care services weren't included on the center's official waiting list.

By Thursday evening, Reps. Michelle Lujan Grisham, Ben Ray Luján, both Democrats, were joined by Republican Rep. Steve Pearce in echoing the call.

Meanwhile, The Associated Press reported that Shinseki spoke privately with lawmakers and met with nearly two dozen veterans groups, assuring them that he takes the reports seriously and is moving swiftly to fix problems. Today, he is to address the National Coalition for Homeless Veterans, outlining his plans for corrections.

While initially focused on Phoenix, the investigation described Wednesday by the VA Department's inspector general found broad and deep-seated problems in the sprawling health care system, which provides medical care to about 6.5 million veterans annually.

In New Mexico, more than 64,335 veterans were treated at the Raymond G. Murphy VA Medical Center in Albuquerque last year, according to a spokeswoman.

TheJournal reported earlier this month that VA whistle-blowers in Albuquerque, as far back as last fall, complained about similar manipulation of patient appointment records. It's unclear what became of that inquiry, but the Raymond G. Murphy center is among those medical centers that are under current scrutiny.

Udall, who is seeking re-election this year, said new leadership at the VA is needed to restore accountability and transparency.

"Independent investigators at the VA are now confirming what I have been saying for weeks; that the problems at the VA are systemic and rooted in a culture that has rewarded cover-ups and cheating to the point of risking the health of our veterans," Udall said in a statement.

Udall plans to submit his own report to the VA inspector general based on information he has received from veterans, their families and others, who have contacted his office about similar problems at the VA in New Mexico.

VA here mum

VA officials in Albuquerque haven't yet responded to Journal requests about how well the Albuquerque health center met its performance goals. Nor have they released the amount of merit-based performance bonuses, if any, that were paid to VA executives in New Mexico in the most recent fiscal year.

VA spokeswoman Sonja Brown said Thursday in an email that the Albuquerque VA health system keeps an electronic wait list, but when asked by the Journal how many patients were on the list she responded, "I don't have this information."

Heinrich, in his prepared statement, said he visited the regional VA center in Albuquerque this week and "many of the veterans that I spoke to there were complimentary of their treatment. But even one veteran slipping through the cracks anywhere in the nation is one too many."

In calling for Shinseki to resign, Luján said in a statement that he believes "other VA officials or employees that are responsible for this despicable and disrespectful treatment of our veterans must step down as well."

Lujan Grisham noted in her statement that the VA's inspector general is still reviewing "significant allegations" stemming from the Phoenix inquiry.

But she added, "We can't wait around for more reviews. We need an outside investigation into Albuquerque's VA facility."

In his statement, Pearce thanked Shinseki "for his decades of service to the military."

"Unfortunately, his leadership and administration of the VA has not successfully provided the services and benefits to those he is supposed to serve," Pearce said.

Eleven Senate Democrats had called for Shinseki's resignation since Wednesday, when the VA inspector general report came out, The Associated Press reported. All but Heinrich are on the ballot this fall.

White House press secretary Jay Carney declined to say whether President Barack Obama still has full confidence in Shinseki, who has led the VA since the start of the Obama administration. The president is waiting for a full investigation into the VA before deciding who should be held accountable, Carney said.

Sandia land swap very close;
Sandia Pueblo to get 700-acre parcel on west face of Sandias

BYLINE: Copyright © 2014 Albuquerque Journal By Rick Nathanson Journal Staff Writer

LENGTH: 554 words

It was more than a decade in the making, but a land swap between the U.S. Forest Service and Sandia Pueblo is about to conclude, awaiting only a signature from President Barack Obama.

As a result, a roughly 700-acre parcel of land on the west face of the Sandia Mountains and located near Placitas, will be signed over to Sandia Pueblo.

In turn, the pueblo will exchange about 160 acres of land along the Piedra Lisa Trail, which the Forest Service will maintain as a conservation easement, as well as a 70-acre parcel called the La Luz Tract that butts up to the La Luz Trail.

Under the terms of the federal legislation, none of the lands in the swap may be developed, said Dominic Gabello, chief of staff for Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham, D-N.M., primary sponsor of the Sandia Pueblo Settlement Technical Amendment Act, which passed the House on Wednesday.

Co-sponsoring the legislation were Reps. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., and Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. A Senate version of the legislation sponsored by New Mexico Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich passed earlier this year.

The legislation amends the 2003 T'uf Shur Bien Preservation Trust Area Act, enacted into law more 11 years ago to resolve Sandia Pueblo's long-standing claim to 10,000 acres on the west face of the Sandia Mountains. That act allowed for the pueblo to continue using the land for religious purposes and gave it control over some future uses, while title of the land remained with the federal government. It also required the Forest Service to consider the land exchange, which lies outside the preservation trust area.

"Passage of this legislation moves the pueblo closer to securing their sacred lands for future generations," Lujan Grisham said in a statement. "Tribal communities across the nation face difficulties accessing and protecting sacred sites that have religious and cultural significance, and whenever possible it is the responsibility of Congress to place these sites under tribal control."

That was a large part of the argument made by Sandia Pueblo Gov. Stuart Paisano and the pueblo's Tribal Council in claiming ownership of the thousands of acres of national forest land in the Sandia Mountains. Those property rights were mistakenly omitted from a federal survey about 150 years ago, Paisano said.

"Sandia Pueblo's overall goal was to preserve and protect the Sandia Mountains from any future development," Paisano said. "That was always our fear."

As added insurance, several years ago the pueblo purchased about 200 acres from a private owner. That land will now be added to the 700 acre parcel in Placitas. In addition, the La Luz Tract, which will now become protected Forest Service land, had previously been in private hands before also being purchased by the pueblo, Paisano said.

"All current Forest Service-approved uses for the Sandia Wilderness designated area will continue," he added. "Nobody who currently uses the land is being excluded, and hasn't been since the original act passed 11 years ago."

Paisano thanked the Forest Service for its cooperation and assistance in working with the pueblo and New Mexico's congressional delegation on the bill.

"It was truly a bipartisan, group effort that seems all too rare in recent years, and the Pueblo extends its sincere thanks to all who were involved and lent their support," he said.

NM still offering your father's primary election

SECTION: EDITORIALS; Pg. A6

LENGTH: 328 words

In New Mexico's primary elections roughly one out of every five registered voters - around 200,000 people - can't vote. It's not because they missed early voting or will be out of town or forgot to get an absentee ballot.

It's because they declined to pledge allegiance to one of two parties and instead registered as "Decline To State."

And while one in four registered Democrats and Republicans are considered young voters - between the ages of 18 and 34 - they accounted for no more than one in 10 votes cast in the 2010 party primaries. According to New Mexico political analyst Brian Sanderoff, president of Research & Polling, the over-50 group accounts for 75 percent of primary election ballots cast.

Like early-bird dinner specials and senior discounts, primary voting in New Mexico is now considered "an over-50 affair," and voter apathy is high. Early voting turnout has been down from the last gubernatorial primary in 2010, with just a few thousand votes cast in each of the state's most populous counties.

That's unfortunate, considering the Democrats have five candidates vying to take on Gov. Susana Martinez in the fall; the Republicans have two who want Sen. Tom Udall's seat, two who want Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham's and two who want Rep. Ben Ray Luján's; there's an ugly Democratic contest for treasurer; five Democrats are running for two Public Regulation Commission jobs; and a slew of state House seats, judgeships, county commission posts and sheriff's badges are up for grabs.

It is a vital component of a representative democracy that registered voters ensure they are heard. With two days of early voting left and a full Election Day on Tuesday, there's still time for New Mexicans registered with one of the two major parties to vote.

And there's plenty of time for incumbent and new members of the 2015 Legislature to move the state forward for all voters by finally allowing people, not just parties, a voice in New Mexico's primary elections.

Congressional Votes for New Mexico the Week of 05/23 - 05/29/2014

BYLINE: by TARGETED NEWS SERVICE, Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 2122 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON, May 30 -- There were 12 key votes in the House this week; the House held a total of 29 roll call votes in the week ending Thursday. The Senate was not in session this week. The most important House vote was to pass a bill funding the Departments of Justice and Commerce in fiscal year 2015, as well as science programs and other related agencies.

In addition to roll call votes, the House also passed the Venezuelan Human Rights and Democracy Protection Act (H.R. 4587), sponsored by Rep. Ileana Ros-Lehtinen, R-Fla., to impose sanctions on individuals found responsible for carrying out or ordering human rights abuses against Venezuelan citizens; a bill (H.R. 4028), sponsored by Rep. Grace Meng, D-N.Y., to list the desecration of cemeteries among the violations of the right to religious freedom set out by the International Religious Freedom Act; the Gulf War Health Research Reform Act (H.R. 4261), sponsored by Rep. Mike Coffman, R-Colo., to improve research of the Gulf War Illness and reform the Research Advisory Committee on Gulf War Veterans' Illnesses; and a bill (H.R. 2527), sponsored by Rep. Dina Titus, D-Nev., to amend the U.S. Code to provide veterans with counseling and treatment for sexual trauma suffered during inactive duty training.

Here's a look at how area members of Congress voted over the previous week.

There were no key votes in the Senate this week.

HOUSE VOTES:

House Vote 1:

RESOLUTION ON HUMAN RIGHTS IN CHINA: The House has passed a resolution (H. Res. 599), sponsored by Rep. Christopher H. Smith, R-N.J. The resolution urged China's government to respect the human rights of its citizens and allow open discussion of the Tiananmen Square Massacre in June 1989. Smith said that as the 25th anniversary of the end of the Tiananmen Square protests approaches, "the memory of the dead and those arrested, tortured, and exiled requires us to honor them, respect their noble aspirations for fundamental freedoms, and recommit ourselves to the struggle for freedom and human rights in China." The vote, on May 28, was 379 yeas to 1 nay.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

NOT VOTING: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 2:

DESERT STORM WAR MEMORIAL: The House has passed the National Desert Storm and Desert Shield War Memorial Act (H.R. 503), sponsored by Rep. David P. Roe, R-Tenn. The bill would authorize the National Desert Storm Memorial Association to build the National Desert Storm and Desert Shield Memorial in Washington, D.C., as a memorial to the 1990-1991 Persian Gulf War. Roe said it was important to "establish a monument to honor those who served on active duty in support of Operation Desert Storm or Operation Desert Shield." The vote, on May 28, was unanimous with 370 yeas.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st)

House Vote 3:

WEATHER FORECASTING: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Jim Bridenstine, R-Okla., to the Commerce, Justice, Science, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act (H.R. 4660). The amendment would increase funding for the National Oceanic and Atmospheric Administration's Office of Oceanic and Atmospheric Research by $12 million, with the increase offset by a $12-million cut in funding for the Census Bureau. Bridenstine said increasing spending on weather research "will save countless American lives in the future and allow our citizens to better protect their personal property" by improving forecasts of tornadoes, hurricanes, and other extreme weather events. The vote, on May 29, was 340 yeas to 71 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st)

House Vote 4:

CRIMINAL BACKGROUND CHECKS: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Mike Thompson, D-Calif., to the Commerce, Justice, Science, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act (H.R. 4660). The amendment would increase funding for the National Instant Criminal Background Check System by $19.5 million, with the increase offset by spending cuts elsewhere. Thompson said that by improving state submission of data into the background check system, his amendment would help stop dangerous people who otherwise wouldn't pass a background check from buying guns because they are not listed in the system. The vote, on May 29, was 260 yeas to 145 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

NAYS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 5:

SPENDING ON SCIENCE RESEARCH: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Lamar Smith, R-Texas, to the Commerce, Justice, Science, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act (H.R. 4660). The amendment would redirect $15.35 million within the National Science Foundation from being used for research into the social, behavioral, and economic sciences directorate to being used for research into the physical sciences and engineering. Smith said "investments in science are essential if our country is to continue to lead the world in nanotechnology, supercomputing, and other fields that yield new jobs, new businesses, and, in fact, entire new industries," whereas the spending on social, behavioral, and economic sciences has often been wasteful. An amendment opponent, Rep. Chaka Fattah, D-Pa., said redirecting the funding would mean less research into areas such as posttraumatic stress and behavior in the face of disasters that improves and saves lives. The vote, on May 29, was 208 yeas to 201 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 6:

GROWING INDUSTRIAL HEMP: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Suzanne Bonamici, D-Ore., to the Commerce, Justice, Science, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act (H.R. 4660). The amendment would bar funding for the Justice Department to prevent states from implementing their own laws to authorize the growth and use of industrial hemp. Bonamici said her amendment "recognized the importance of industrial hemp as a natural resource, an agricultural commodity, and a versatile component in thousands of commercial products" and the unreasonableness of Justice's efforts to block farmers from growing hemp. An amendment opponent, Rep. Frank R. Wolf, R-Va., said there were no restrictions on the licensed use of domestically produced or traded industrial hemp products, making the amendment unnecessary. The vote, on May 29, was 237 yeas to 170 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

NAYS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 7:

MEDICAL MARIJUANA: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Dana Rohrabacher, R-Calif., to the Commerce, Justice, Science, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act (H.R. 4660). The amendment would bar funding for the Justice Department to take action to prevent 29 states from implementing their laws authorizing the use of medical marijuana. Rohrabacher said the amendment acknowledged the right of states to adopt their own laws without interference from the federal government and respected the doctor-patient relationship and freedom of doctors to prescribe medicines they feel their patients need. An amendment opponent, Rep. Andy Harris, R-Md., said the amendment was "the camel's nose under the tent" in that it would support efforts to legalize recreational use of marijuana, and it would harm the Drug Enforcement Administration's efforts to stop the illegal marijuana trade. The vote, on May 29, was 219 yeas to 189 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

NAYS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 8:

CONFIDENTIALITY OF REPORTER SOURCES: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Alan Grayson, D-Fla., to the Commerce, Justice, Science, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act (H.R. 4660). The amendment would bar funding for the Justice Department to take action to compel journalists to testify about information they have received from confidential sources. Grayson said adopting the so-called shield law to protect a reporter's confidential sources would compel the federal government to respect freedom of the press, following the lead of 49 other states that have adopted their own shield laws. An amendment opponent, Rep. Frank R. Wolf, R-Va., said it was not appropriate to insert the amendment into an appropriations bill without notice and without giving Congress the chance to hold hearings on the issue. The vote, on May 29, was 225 yeas to 183 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

NAYS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 9:

MANAGING INTERNET DOMAIN NAMES: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Sean P. Duffy, R-Wis., to the Commerce, Justice, Science, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act (H.R. 4660). The amendment would bar funding to end the National Telecommunications and Information Administration's responsibility for administering the Internet domain name system. Duffy said shifting responsibility for the system to an international or foreign body, as has been proposed by President Obama, would diminished freedom of speech online by giving authoritarian governments the power to control the Internet. An amendment opponent, Rep. Chaka Fattah, D-Pa., said it "would suggest to countries like China and others that we want to control the Internet versus we want it to be an opportunity for people to gather information, speak freely, and associate freely." The vote, on May 29, was 229 yeas to 178 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 10:

SANCTUARY CITIES AND LAW ENFORCEMENT: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Steve King, R-Iowa, to the Commerce, Justice, Science, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act (H.R. 4660). The amendment would bar the Justice Department from providing funding for law enforcement agencies in cities that have sanctuary policies to shield illegal immigrants from being deported by the federal government. King said Congress had "a responsibility to assert our constitutional and statutory authority" on immigration, and should do so by punishing cities that do not obey federal immigration law. An amendment opponent, Rep. Chaka Fattah, D-Pa., said the amendment would punish sanctuary cities that are "trying to make the best of a very tough situation that the federal government is creating" by failing to reform immigration policies. The vote, on May 29, was 214 yeas to 194 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 11:

GHG EMISSIONS AND TRADE AGREEMENTS: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Mark Meadows, R-N.C., to the Commerce, Justice, Science, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act (H.R. 4660). The amendment would bar funding for reaching trade agreements that limit greenhouse gas emissions. Meadows said emissions limits could cost the U.S. millions of jobs in coming decades, and Congress has already passed legislation blocking cap-and-trade GHG emissions measures, so his amendment "would carry on the will of the House in terms of making sure that we wouldn't use any funds to circumvent the will of Congress." The vote, on May 29, was 226 yeas to 179 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 12:

FUNDING COMMERCE, JUSTICE, SCIENCE PROGRAMS: The House has passed the Commerce, Justice, Science, and Related Agencies Appropriations Act (H.R. 4660), sponsored by Rep. Frank R. Wolf, R-Va. The bill would provide $51.2 billion to fund the Commerce Department, Justice Department, National Science Foundation, and related agencies in fiscal 2015. Wolf said the funding focused on "fighting crime and terrorism, including a focus on preventing and investigating cyber attacks; and boosting U.S. competitiveness and job creation by investing in exports, manufacturing, science, and space exploration." A bill opponent, Rep. Jim McDermott, D-Wash., criticized the bill's lack of funding for fish hatcheries in Alaska and the Northwest, which he said were necessary to maintain the nation's supply of salmon and other fish. The vote, on May 29, was 321 yeas to 87 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NM delegation joins call for Shinseki to resign

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL

LENGTH: 143 words

DATELINE: ALBUQUERQUE, N.M.

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) - New Mexico's congressional delegation is part of the chorus of lawmakers calling for Veterans Affairs Secretary Eric Shinseki to resign.

Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and Reps. Steve Pearce, Ben Ray Lujan and Michelle Lujan Grisham say independent investigators have confirmed that problems within the VA are systemic, and President Barack Obama needs to appoint new leadership that can restore accountability and transparency within the VA system.

They say veterans deserve better.

A probe of operations at the Phoenix VA Health Care System found that about 1,700 veterans in need of care were at risk of being lost or forgotten after being kept off an official waiting list. Problems were also found nationwide.

Udall called for an investigation of New Mexico's VA after concerns about waiting times and care were raised in Phoenix.

Republicans vie to challenge Sen. Tom Udall

BYLINE: JERI CLAUSING, Associated Press

SECTION: POLITICAL NEWS; STATE AND REGIONAL

LENGTH: 634 words

DATELINE: ALBUQUERQUE, N.M.

ALBUQUERQUE, N.M. (AP) - A pair of Republicans are headed for a showdown in next week's primary seeking the opportunity to challenge Democratic U.S. Sen. Tom Udall, a popular incumbent making his first bid at re-election.

Allen Weh, a 71-year-old retired Marine colonel and wealthy aerospace entrepreneur from Albuquerque, is a veteran of New Mexico politics. A former New Mexico Republican Party Chairman, Weh also made a run for governor four years ago, coming in second behind Gov. Susana Martinez in a five-way primary.

Running against him in Tuesday's primary is 34-year-David Clements of Las Cruces, an attorney and former Dona Ana County GOP chairman making his first run at elected office on a shoestring budget, building grassroots support as he travels the state in a well-used Isuzu truck.

Weh says he is running "because Washington is broken."

"I think where I am in life, instead of kicking back, I felt like I could make a difference," he said in a recent interview. "One man can't solve all the nation's problems, but a person who is really committed to making a difference can effect some positive change."

Weh also said the Senate needs fewer lawyers and more veterans. Udall and Clements are both lawyers.

Clements, who has taken a leave from law to travel the state drumming up support, said he decided to run because "my wife and I, like a lot of people, are jaded. We feel like there is no representation at the federal level."

Both Clements and Weh cite federal spending and the Affordable Care Act as key issues, although they differ on health care. Clements wants a full repeal. Weh says he would be open to tweaking the new law, saying the nation's health care system has been a mess for years.

Clements has been running since October, and has raised and spent about $40,000. Weh joined the race in January and has raised nearly $600,000, including $217,000 of his own money.

Clements has substituted shoe leather for cash, and garnered enough grassroots support to make a surprisingly strong showing at the state GOP's pre-primary convention in April, where he won 47 percent of the ballots.

Whoever wins the primary, however, has a tough uphill battle. A recent computer model of races conducted for The New York Times says Udall is one of 14 Senate incumbents with a 99 percent chance of retaining their seats.

Weh and Clements's response: The New York Times is a long way from New Mexico.

But University of New Mexico political science professor Gabriel Sanchez agrees the candidates have little chance of unseating Udall, a popular former congressman with $3 million cash on hand, even if popular Republican Gov. Susana Martinez wins a big victory in her re-election bid as many expect and that attracts more GOP-leaning voters to the polls.

"First, New Mexicans have shown consistently that their voting behavior differs in federal and state level races, with many instances where the majority of voters supported a GOP presidential candidate but a Democratic governor or other state wide candidate - and vice versa," Sanchez said.

In other primary races, two political newcomers are vying for the Republican nomination for the 1st Congressional District seat currently held by Democrat Michelle Lujan Grisham. Richard Priem, a 64-year-old businessman and retired Army veteran from Albuquerque, is running against 66-year-old Mike Frese, a scientist and small business owner from Corrales.

For the 2nd Congressional seat, Democrat Robert Blanch, an assistant district attorney in Albuquerque, is running against fellow Democrat and three-term incumbent Rep. Ben Ray Lujan.

There are no primary races for southern New Mexico's 3rd Congressional District seat currently held by Republican Steve Pearce, who will run against Democratic attorney Roxanne "Rocky" Laura from Carlsbad in November.

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today calling for U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs Secretary Eric Shinseki to step down.

"Secretary Eric Shinseki has a long record of service to our nation and has shown a deep commitment to our veterans. However, the fact is there has been serious mistreatment of veterans as a result of systemic problems within the VA. I join Senators Udall and Heinrich in calling for Secretary Shinseki's resignation, but other VA officials or employees that are responsible for this despicable and disrespectful treatment of our veterans must step down as well. CAMPAIGN 2014: Tuesday primaries to set up battles in three key Western states

SECTION: POLITICS Vol. 10 No. 9

LENGTH: 1651 words

Jennifer Yachnin, E&E reporter

Another intense round of primary contests will take place Tuesday when voters from eight states head to the polls, determining a slate of contests that includes three Western Senate battles. In New Mexico, Sen. Tom Udall (D) will seek a second term, while in South Dakota voters will pick candidates in an open-seat race to replace retiring Sen. Tim Johnson (D). Perhaps the most contentious battle, though, will happen in Montana, where appointed Sen. John Walsh must win the Democratic nod to defend his seat from likely GOP nominee Rep.

Steve Daines. Here's a look at the upcoming elections in each of those states: Montana Democrats and Republicans were already gearing up for a battle in Big Sky Country -- where GOP presidential nominee Mitt Romney took 55 percent in the 2012 election, while Democrats won a contentious Senate battle -- when President Obama tapped then-Sen. Max Baucus (D) to be U.S. ambassador to China late last year. Montana Gov. Steve Bullock (D) picked then-Lt. Gov. Walsh to serve out the remaining 11 months of Baucus' term. But Walsh's appointment hasn't exactly curtailed the contentious open-seat race that had been expected if Baucus retired as planned. Walsh still faces a primary challenge next week from former Lt. Gov. John Bohlinger and rancher Dirk Adams. And while Republicans largely cleared the field for Daines, not everyone got out of the way. In addition to the freshman lawmaker, state Rep. Champ Edmunds and massage therapist Susan Cundiff are also seeking the GOP nomination. Still, Walsh and Daines -- who have significant cash advantages over their competitors, having raised $1.9 million and $4.1 million, respectively -- have largely focused on attacking each other ahead of the primaries. Similarly, third-party groups have focused solely on the expected nominees, although those organizations have spent just $420,000 in the race to date, according to the Center for Responsive Politics. By comparison, third-party groups pumped $27 million into the 2012 contest between Sen. Jon Tester (D) and then-Rep. Denny Rehberg (R). While Daines claims more funds from the energy and natural resources industries -- he received $271,000 this cycle from donors related to mining, oil and gas, and electric utilities, according to CRP data -- Walsh has received the Montana Conservation Voters' endorsement. Although both candidates have called for the construction of the Keystone XL pipeline, Daines has criticized Walsh for a bill he sponsored that would shift approval of cross-border projects solely to the State Department.

Daines has also slammed the Democratic-controlled Senate as "anti-coal," telling the Associated Press earlier this month: "The Democratic-led Senate has been complicit in supporting President Barack Obama's war on coal, and Montanans don't like it." But in a Democratic debate in Great Falls, Mont., earlier this month, Walsh called for continued coal extraction and North American energy production. "We want to move away from fossil fuel consumption, but it's not going to happen overnight," Walsh said, according to the Great Falls Tribune. Other candidates in Montana's primaries have sought to make a mark by opting for more extreme positions. During the Great Falls debate, Adams sought to position himself as the "environmentalist in this campaign." "I'm the one who opposes the Keystone XL pipeline. I'm the one who says coal is dead, and it is. There is no investment thesis for coal," Adams said. "I'm the guy who talks about climate change on the campaign trail." At a March event in Sidney, Mont., Edmunds called for dismantling U.S. EPA and rejected the idea of climate change. "I would like to see the EPA go away," Edmunds told the Sidney Herald. "They're a bunch of greenies and they're coming up with rules to do away with industries that they don't agree with. They don't like fossil fuels, they don't like coal." He added: "Human-caused and human-affected climate change is not happening." Montana voters will also pick candidates to compete for the state's at-large House seat, which Daines is giving up to seek the Senate seat. Republicans are expected to continue their domination of the state's sole House seat, which the GOP has held since 1996 when Republican Rick Hill won an open-seat race to replace then-Rep. John Williams (D). Leading the field of five Republicans seeking their party's nod are state Sen. Matt Rosendale, former state Senate Minority Leader Corey Stapleton and former state Sen. Ryan Zinke. State Sen. Elsie Arntzen and real estate investor Drew Turiano are also candidates. Among the trio of leading candidates, all offer similar platforms -- including support for KXL -- but have claimed endorsements from different wings of the Republican Party. Rosendale has received support from conservative groups like FreedomWorks and the Tea Party Express, while Zinke has the backing of the U.S. Chamber of Commerce and former Sen. Conrad Burns (R). Stapleton is backed by former Gov. Judy Martz (R) but told the Billings Gazette earlier this month: "I haven't really tried to get any" other endorsements. The winner of the GOP nomination will likely face John Lewis, a former top aide to Baucus. Lewis will compete with former state House Speaker and frequent candidate John Driscoll next week for the Democratic nod. South Dakota In South Dakota, a crowd of Republicans is vying for the right to succeed Johnson as the GOP makes picking up the open Senate seat a top priority this cycle. The winner of the five-candidate GOP contest -- which could go to a runoff if no Republican receives more than 35 percent of the vote -- will be favored against former congressional aide Rick Weiland, who is unopposed for the Democratic nomination. Former Gov. Mike Rounds leads the Republican field, using his significant cash advantage to promote his candidacy in a range of positive ads. Rounds reported $636,000 in the bank in mid-May, after raising nearly $3.1 million at that time. He is widely expected to cinch the GOP nomination. But he must defeat political novice and physician Annette Bosworth. Bosworth reported $348,000 in the bank in mid-May after raising $1.1 million. Other candidates in the race include state Sen. Larry Rhoden and state Rep. Stace Nelson, who each raised about $116,000 in their bids, and attorney Jason Ravnsborg, who has raised $23,000. But the GOP nominee and Weiland will face additional competition in November. Former Sen. Larry Pressler (R) is running an independent bid. According to a recent SurveyUSA poll, conducted for South Dakota-based KSFY News, KOTA-TV and the Aberdeen American News, Rounds leads both Weiland and Pressler in the general election. The poll gave Rounds 44 percent, followed by Weiland with 30 percent and Presser with 17 percent. The survey of 504 likely voters, conducted May 6 to 10, had a 4.5-point margin of error. South Dakota Gov. Dennis Daugaard (R), who is seeking his second term in office, also faces a primary challenge next week but is expected to easily defeat former state Rep. Lora Hubbel (R). Daugaard will likewise be heavily favored in November, when he will face either retired state Wildland Fire Suppression Director Joe Lowe (D) or state Rep. Susan Wismer. South Dakota's at-large House lawmaker Rep. Kristi Noem (R) does not face a primary challenge this cycle.

Land of incumbents New Mexico voters will also head to the polls next week to pick challengers to both Udall and Gov. Susana Martinez (R). Martinez faces no primary competition in the gubernatorial race, but five Democrats will vie on the ballot for the right to face the governor in November. Among the front-runners are state Attorney General Gary King, the son of former Gov. Bruce King; businessman Alan Webber; and former Albuquerque Chief Administrative Officer Lawrence Rael, who made a failed 2010 Democratic primary bid to compete for the lieutenant governor's office. According to an Albuquerque Journal poll released Sunday, nearly a third of voters remained undecided in the Democratic primary. Among those with an opinion, King leads the field with 22 percent, followed by Rael and Webber, tied with 16 percent each. The poll of 631 registered Democrats, conducted May 20 to 22, had a 3.9-point margin of error. But the winner of the Democratic primary will be the underdog against a well-funded Martinez as she seeks a second term. Udall is likewise a heavy favorite as he seeks a second term in the Senate, with most political prognosticators rating his seat safely Democratic. Still, a pair of Republicans is competing for the right to challenge Udall in November: former New Mexico Republican Party Chairman Allen Weh, who lost the 2010 GOP gubernatorial nomination to Martinez, and former Dona Ana County Republican Chairman David Clements. The GOP primary contest has turned combative at times. The Clements campaign accused a Weh aide of hacking its email accounts following the state GOP convention earlier this year, and the Weh campaign has sought to highlight a plagiarism incident in which Clements' website utilized sections of text from Rep. Justin Amash's (R-Mich.) website. Weh boats a significant cash advantage in the GOP race, with $205,000 in his war chest in mid-May after raising $583,000 at that time. Clements had $7,000 in the bank at the end of March but has not filed a campaign finance report since then. But Udall, who leads the Environment and Public Works Subcommittee on Superfund, Toxics and Environmental Health, will be able to easily outspend either of his would-be challengers. The New Mexico lawmaker reported $5.8 million in the bank as of mid-May. Among New Mexico's trio of House lawmakers, only Rep. Ben Ray Luján (D) faces a primary challenge next week. But Luján, like Reps. Michelle Lujan Grisham (D) and Steve Pearce (R), is expected to win re-election this fall.

Tucumcari VFW Post conducts memorial services

LENGTH: 235 words

May 28--A solemn ceremony Monday at the Tucumcari Memorial Park Cemetery honored fallen veterans.

The ceremony was conducted by the Delfido Gonzales Chapter 2528 of the Veterans of Foreign Wars.

Ron Wilmot, who represents U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Lujan (D-New Mexico), read a statement from Lujan that said the ceremony this year was marred by news of service delays for veterans seeking treatment at Veterans Administration health facilities. Lujan's statement said such treatment should never be allowed.

Tucumcari City Commissioner John Mihm, a veteran, said the ceremony was a fitting way to honor veterans who have served their country.

Fred Porter, commander of VFW Post 2528 said that veterans' service had "made us their debtors."

Because of the veterans, he said, "Our flag flies over free people."

Chaplain Robert Prieto prayed that the U.S. continues to be a land of "freedom, peace and righteousness."

At a luncheon following the ceremony, Julian Vargas, a sixth grader at Tucumcari Middle School, read his prize-winning essay.

"We're called patriots because we don't give up," he said. "We get up and fight again."

To be patriotic, he said, "is to give to the community."

To keep the nation free, he said, Americans must keep up "a passion for where we live."

LUJAN STATEMENT ON MEMORIAL DAY; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 511 words

Santa Fe, NM - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today in honor of Memorial Day and the men and women who have served in the Armed Forces. Lujan will celebrate Memorial Day on Monday, May 26 in Angel Fire at the Vietnam Veterans Memorial State Park.

"New Mexico has a long and proud tradition of service in our Armed Forces and bravely answering the call of duty when our country needs them most. So many brave men and women have put their country first and made a commitment to protect the values of freedom and liberty that we hold dear.

"My grandfather, Luis Lujan was one of these individuals, as he served this great nation in World War II when he left behind six children and his loving wife who was expecting their youngest son. He fought so bravely like all of his brothers in arms, and he returned home to the warm embrace of a loving family that missed him dearly. But sadly, so many brave soldiers were lost on the field of battle. Today we remember these men and all the men and women throughout our history, who in conflicts near and far have protected this nation with everything they had, making the ultimate sacrifice.

"Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. said: 'A man who won't die for something is not fit to live.' The men and women who have died for their country were not only fit to live, but they will forever live on as long as we continue to remember their service and honor their sacrifice. Because while we might not know all the stories of heroism that have been displayed, we know that we owe each individual our deepest gratitude and respect.

"On Memorial Day, we also reflect on our veterans and those who continue to serve in harm's way as we pray for their swift and safe return home. And as we do so, it comes at a time when we've heard deeply disturbing reports of mismanagement at VA health clinics.

"When we as a nation ask brave Americans to serve and protect our country, we make a promise that when they answer the call of duty we will provide them with the care they have earned. Any failure to live up to that obligation strikes at the very heart of our commitment to our men and women in uniform and the veterans who have sacrificed so much. It breaks a solemn promise to our veterans and shakes the faith of the American people that our veterans will be treated like the heroes they are.

"There must be swift action to restore that faith by getting to the bottom of any failure to care for our veterans, addressing the backlogs, and taking steps to implement real reforms that will ensure this mismanagement does not occur again. So as we honor the memories, the valor, and the sacrifice of the men and women we have lost, we must also commit to fulfill our promises to those who have returned home.

"To our all our members of the Armed Forces who have died in service to our country, to all the veterans who returned home, and to all those who serve this very day - thank you."

New Mexico Dems: Congressman Ben Ray Lujan Highlights Tourette Syndrome Month on the House Floor

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 313 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District spoke today on the House floor to bring attention to Tourette Syndrome Awareness Month. Lujan shared a letter he received from, Alexander Dennis, a constituents from Rio Rancho who has been working to bring awareness to the disorder. Below are his remarks as prepared.

"Mr. Speaker, last week I had the opportunity to meet with a bright young boy who was diagnosed with Tourette Syndrome and is working to bring attention to this disorder. His passion is an inspiration, and I want to share his own words about the importance of raising awareness:

Dear Congressman Lujan,

My name is Alexander Dennis. I live in Rio Rancho, New Mexico and am 14 years old. I grew up with a neurological disorder called Tourette Syndrome. It causes me and about 200,000 others in the United States to make sudden movements and uncontrollable sounds.

This disorder affects me daily and is a lifelong condition. There is no cure for Tourette Syndrome. I have to live daily with painful neck and full body jerks. Others with this disorder have different severity levels and different types of movements. It is noticeable to others but I do not know that I am doing the movements sometimes.

There are not many doctors that are experienced with Tourette Syndrome and it took me four years to be properly diagnosed.

May 15 through June 15 is Tourette Syndrome Awareness Month and I am writing to you because I am working to raise awareness to the challenges people that have this syndrome face. Any help that you can give will be greatly appreciated by me and all that suffer from this disorder. Thank you.

"Thank you Alexander for your voice, and I look forward to working with you on this issue."

"Mr. Speaker, last week I had the opportunity to meet with a bright young boy who was diagnosed with Tourette Syndrome and is working to bring attention to this disorder. His passion is an inspiration, and I want to share his own words about the importance of raising awareness:

Dear Congressman Lujan,

My name is Alexander Dennis. I live in Rio Rancho, New Mexico and am 14 years old. I grew up with a neurological disorder called Tourette Syndrome. It causes me and about 200,000 others in the United States to make sudden movements and uncontrollable sounds.

This disorder affects me daily and is a lifelong condition. There is no cure for Tourette Syndrome. I have to live daily with painful neck and full body jerks. Others with this disorder have different severity levels and different types of movements. It is noticeable to others but I do not know that I am doing the movements sometimes.

There are not many doctors that are experienced with Tourette Syndrome and it took me four years to be properly diagnosed.

May 15 through June 15 is Tourette Syndrome Awareness Month and I am writing to you because I am working to raise awareness to the challenges people that have this syndrome face. Any help that you can give will be greatly appreciated by me and all that suffer from this disorder. Thank you.

"Thank you Alexander for your voice, and I look forward to working with you on this issue."

CHC Members on President Obama's Designation of the Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks National Monument; National Monument Will Honor Latino History, Generate Economic Benefits for Local Economies; Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 595 words

Washington, D.C. - Members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus today released the following statement in response to President Obama's announcement that he will use his authority under the 1906 Antiquities Act to establish the Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks National Monument. The monument, located in Las Cruces, New Mexico, will help tell the story of Latinos in American history and protect unique natural resources for the nation's benefit.

The designation is expected to promote economic growth in the local community through tourism and outdoor recreation.

Rep. Raul M. Grijalva of Arizona, the ranking member of the House Subcommittee on Public Lands and Environmental Regulation, congratulated President Obama on the announcement and highlighted its importance for everyone interested in Hispanic American history.

"The Organ Mountains tell the story of centuries of conflict, boundary disputes and reconciliations with Mexico," Grijalva said. "Many Latino families in the Southwest trace their roots to the region, and its natural beauty continues to draw people today. Designating this sensitive area as a national monument means the Organ Mountains will inspire and be enjoyed by generations of Americans to come, and I couldn't be happier to support President Obama's decision."

"New Mexico is blessed with majestic lands and the Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks are a tremendous example of the beauty of our great state," said Rep. Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico. "The people of New Mexico have a special connection with these precious lands and the monument designation will ensure that not only the land but our culture and way of life will be protected for years to come. Thanks to the efforts of so many stakeholders in southern New Mexico who have worked hard to advocate for this designation, the Organ Mountains will attract more visitors, provide a boost to tourism, and strengthen the local economy."

"I am very pleased with the designation of the Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks as a national monument. This national treasure is not only central in preserving the region's biodiversity, but it is also key in protecting New Mexico's rich history and diverse culture for future generations," said Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham of New Mexico. "Preserving this land will protect New Mexico's tourism and outdoor economy, while also spurring economic development and job growth in the state. This new monument is an investment in New Mexico's communities and future generations."

According to a 2013 economic studyby BBC Research and Consulting, protecting the Organ Mountains would generate $7.4 million in new economic activity annually and double the number of jobs supported by outdoor recreation and tourism in the area. Furthermore, a 2006 study by the National Parks and Conservation Association revealed each federal dollar invested in national parks generates at least four dollars of economic value to the public.

President Obama has previously designated monuments honoring the contributions of Latinos to American society using the Antiquities Act. This includes the Cesar E. Chavez National Monument in California, Chavez' home and the headquarters of the United Farm Workers of America since the early 1970s when Chavez was its president.

Raul M. Grijalva, who also serves as a co-chair of the National Landscape Conservation System Caucus, sent a letter to President Obama thanking him for the significant contribution to the National Conservation Lands.

LUJAN STATEMENT ON REPORTS OF MISMANAGEMENT AT VA MEDICAL CENTERS; Rep. Ben R. Lujan (D-NM) News Release

SECTION: U.S. HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES DOCUMENTS

LENGTH: 220 words

Washington, D.C. - Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on reports of mismanagement at Department of Veterans Affairs medical centers. Lujan recently sent a letter to Secretary Shinseki expressing concerns with these reports and excessive wait times for veterans in New Mexico seeking health care services from the VA.

"When we as a nation ask brave Americans to serve and protect our county, we make a promise that when they answer the call of duty we will provide them with the care they have earned. The deeply disturbing reports of mismanagement at VA medical clinics strike at the very heart of our commitment to our men and women in uniform and the veterans who have sacrificed so much. It breaks a solemn promise to our veterans and shakes the faith of the American people that our veterans will be treated like the heroes they are.

"The administration and VA must act swiftly to restore that faith by thoroughly investigating and getting to the bottom of any failure to care for our veterans, addressing the backlogs, and taking steps to implement real reforms that will ensure this mismanagement does not occur again."

REP. G.K. BUTTERFIELD, D-N.C.

WITNESS: THOMAS E. WHEELER, CHAIRMAN, FEDERAL COMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

[*] WALDEN: We'll call to order the Subcommittee on Communications and Technology and certainly want to welcome our members and our witness, the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission. Mr. Wheeler, we're delighted that you would make time to come and spend with us on this important day, with so much going on in the telecommunications world.

Six months ago this subcommittee met for the very first time with the current complement of FCC commissioners, and welcomed Mr. Wheeler as the new chairman. Today, and let me welcome Mr. Wheeler back, we meet to review the record of action and selective inaction that the commission has taken under the first six months of your leadership. Unfortunately, given some of the most recent actions out of the commission, I fear that we may be heading into some rough waters.

When we last met, I offered two pieces of advice to Chairman Wheeler, and his colleagues. First, I urged them to heed the words of Congress, where it was - has spoken and reject calls to act in ways contrary to Congressional intent. Second, I urged them to bear in mind that even seemingly small changes in the Federal Communications Commission rules can have significant impact on the marketplace. I called upon all the members of the commission to discharge their duties with transparency, accountability and a long view of the technological landscape. In sum, my advice was that they must approach their duties with humility and restraint.

Unfortunately, recent actions have hinted that my advice was ignored. In December, we had yet to know that the DC Circuit Court of Appeals would once again reject the commission's attempt to regulate the Internet and could only speculate as to whether the commission under Chairman Wheeler's lead would mount a third attempt. Sadly, we now know the answer. Not only is Chairman Wheeler leading us down this path again, the item the commission adopted last week tees up the long dead idea that the Internet is a common carrier.

This reinvigorated willingness to consider regulating the Internet under Title II of the Communications Act, rules that find their roots in the 19th century railroad regulation, and were designed to regulate the world of telephone monopoly, harking back to a world in which twisted copper was the only portal for consumers, the communications network and voice the only service. The modern communications landscape bears no resemblance to the world Title II was meant to regulate, and application of Title II to the Internet is, at best, a poor fit. Worse still, the practical consequences of reclassification are to give the bureaucrats at the FCC the authority to second guess business decisions and to regulate ever possible aspect of the Internet.

We should all pause and consider the prospect of the FCC as a rate setting authority over Internet access and what that means for innovation in the telephone network of yesteryear. We should also be aware that this path opens a door for states to regulate the Internet. Contrary to any intended effect, the reclassification of broadband service under Title II will harm consumers, halt job creation, curtail innovation and stifle investment.

In sum, at a time when the commission at Congress' direction is taking steps toward even greater growth and innovation across Internet access platforms, the commission is simultaneously contemplating rules that undermine those very efforts and compromise the fundamental approaches of both the Clinton and Bush Administrations that laid the foundation for the Internet that we know today.

It's troubling that some of the actions taken under Chairman Wheeler's watch, the selective inaction of the FCC is equally troubling. Although required under the Telecommunications Act, the Federal Communications Commission has failed to complete its quadrennial review of the limitations on ownership of broadcast properties. It's been six years, six years, since the commission last fulfilled this statutory mandate. Rather than focus on ensuring that the rules reflect reality, however, the chairman has now announced that the commission would essentially scrap the 2010 quadrennial review and begin in earnest its 2014 quadrennial review.

Now, notwithstanding this stale record, the FCC also moved forward to make major changes to the regulations that govern media ownership anyway. It adopted changes to its attribution rules that determine how to count stations toward the local television ownership rule, the FCC also stated that it would begin counting certain shared service agreements toward the local ownership cap. In order to comply with local ownership rules, these pronouncements will likely force broadcasters to divest stations and unwind shared service agreements that are beneficial to ensuring local content in the smaller markets. These changes do not bring benefits to the communities served by these broadcasters, drawing into question how this change could serve the public interest.

Finally, FCC process reform has been an ongoing priority of our subcommittee. It's an issue my colleagues and I are deeply invested in, as demonstrated by the unanimous passage in the House of the bipartisan Federal Communications Commission Process Reform Act on March 11th of this year. Unfortunately, after the events of the past few months I'm sad to say I continue to be troubled by the FCC's seemingly flawed process.

In March the FCC chose to restrict license transfers involving certain shared service agreements which had long been blessed - implicitly blessed by the commission. This action was not debated by the commissioners, nor was it subject to any kind of vote. Rather, it was announced by the chief of the media bureau as a fait accompli.

Recent press reports also allege the chairman's office withheld presentation of revisions to the Open Internet Notice of Proposed Rulemaking from Republicans for as long as 24 hours, after having provided the material to the Democratic commissioners and to the press during the run up to the May 15th FCC Open Meeting. The concern raised by these reports is only compounded by revelations that a substantially revised draft of another item scheduled for vote at the open meeting was not presented to other offices until the closing minutes of the evening before.

According to Commissioner Pai's dissent from the commission's mobile spectrum holdings item, his office received the revised item fewer than 12 hours before the open meeting and the item contained more than 3,000 revisions. So, I find myself channeling Commissioner Rosenworcel, who said of the Open Internet NPRM, that the quote, "Process that got us this rule making today is flawed." Closed quote. Committee has opined in the past that withholding of a revised draft item from other members of the commission until the 11th hour precludes the scrutiny and analysis necessary for ease in decision making. It's my hope that these occurrences were anomalies. Perhaps Chairman Wheeler will want to commit today to providing his fellow commissioners with adequate and equal time to review proposed orders and rules.

The transformative impact of the evolution of technology from a long - analog to digital, from narrow band to broadband, has forever altered our lives. The evolution continues and the commission has before it the issues I just mentioned and many more, all significant in their impacts on our lives and the economy. Stated in your written testimony, you're eager to build on the progress of the last six months going forward, and I hope working together we can move forward in a direction that protects the success, this critical sector of the economy has enjoyed and facilitates its continued growth and job creation unencumbered by over regulatory overreach.

With that, I yield back, and I recognize my friend and colleague from California, Miss Eshoo, the Ranking Member of the subcommittee for her opening statement.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and good morning to all of my colleagues and welcome back to the committee, Chairman Wheeler. Before we do a - a deep dive into the specifics of the chairman's proposal as well as so many other major issues that are before the FCC, I - I think that it would be well for us to step back and appreciate what I believe is one of the most consequential inventions in human history. This was dreamed of and built by disruptors. It's an American story, it's a product of American genius, the Internet. One word, but it is - it really it takes one's breath away in terms of the arc of history.

It's not only an invention, it has reshaped lives, economies here and around the world, and our thinking and our debate today really should be viewed, I think, through the prism of a critical step that we're taking now in the 21st Century. The Internet is a continuum of change. It's accessible. It's open. And its innovations continue. They empower individuals, entire fields of learning, growing not only our economy but economies around the world, and serving humanity in countless ways. All of this has taken place and here we are, in the second decade of the 21st Century.

So, this is huge. This is huge. This is not what is behind door number one, door number two, door number three, where the price is right. This is not some guessing game. This is huge. This is something, these decisions are going to affect every single American going forward, just as it has in the past and it will continue to. So, all of us, regulators, innovators, consumers, legislators, we have to get this right. The stakes are very high and American cannot lose. It's been our leadership that has advanced the digital age. And, now is not the time and, actually, I don't think there should be ever a time to unravel the values that have really been the hallmarks and the bulwarks of the Internet.

So, the question is: how do we seize the future? At least in my view that's what the question is. I know what I want to see continue: openness, free, accessible, these are also the hallmarks of our democracy. And that's what this has been such an extraordinary export of - of our country.

I know what I don't want. I don't want this to become an auction, selling off the best in bits and pieces, where some pay for faster lanes. Others can't pay, they get stuck in the slow lane. Some giant company blocking content and others discriminating so that they can sell their stuff to keep the other guy's stuff stymied. That's not a very pretty description, but it's a street description of what can be at hand.

I want every day to be essentially the Fourth of July for American innovation. So, that it just keeps bursting. It just keeps bursting. And I see it every day in my Congressional district. Looking forward 10 years. 25 years, 50 years, I want this to continue and we should all be thinking on a grand scale, because this growth and this economic driver should be for everyone. We need smart, savvy regulations - regulatory decision, we need a Congress that's engaged in this, and a Congress that's vigilant, and I plan to be.

So, what should the FCC do? I think, and all the articles you read, there's a debate: should it be 706 or should it be Title II? I think that we have to have a clear eyed understanding of what has made the Internet what it is today and what basic values need to be protected and preserved. And then what that is going to look like. And there's more, on top of all of this. Can anyone here today piece together the effects of a Comcast Time Warner merger and an AT&T DirecTV merger on consumers and a free and Open Internet? These are massive decisions, and massive pieces that are moving forward. And what's going to happen to innovation?

Mr. Chairman, Chairman Walden, I urge you to convene a hearing to examine these issues here. I think they deserve to be examined and to be debated and questions asked. So, as I said earlier, every person in the country will be affected by the outcome of these decisions that are before the commission and before us. And, so I look forward to questioning Chairman Wheeler today.

I also ask for unanimous consent that two letters, two very important letters be entered into the record. One, signed by more than a hundred venture capitalists and angel investors who support simple, strong, enforceable rules against online discrimination and access fees. And the other, signed by more than 100 Internet companies, small and large. Mostly small. That support a free and Open Internet.

WALDEN: Without objection.

ESHOO: And I don't know if I have any time remaining. No. I think I've gone over. Well, with that, I'll yield back what I don't have.

WALDEN: Thank the gentlelady for her opening statement and the letters. We'll now turn to the full committee chairman, Mr. Fred Upton, from Michigan for opening comments.

UPTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Oversight is a critical part of this committee's work to foster a smaller, more nimble government for the innovation age. We've held lots of hearings, with all of the FCC's commissioners to address issues of national importance, to keep a close eye on the budget, and to ensure that commission process focusing on promoting jobs and innovation, and today's oversight hearing with Chairman Wheeler will continue that discussion to ensure that the FCC works in a way that benefits consumers, industry and certainly the economy. And I thank you for coming today.

There's a lot to discuss. In the six months since Mr. Wheeler was confirmed as char he has addressed a number of items, including media ownership, the IP transition, universal service and just this past week, of course, the incentive auctions and net neutrality. While I appreciate the chairman's leadership, on one of these I have serious concerns with some others.

As an initial matter, Chairman Wheeler started off his chairmanship with a review of FCC procedure, an issue that this subcommittee has spent lots of time working to reform in a bipartisan manner. But, I was disappointed to see some of the process failures that occurred last week. Media reports of an Open Meeting item being circulated to commissioners as late as midnight the evening before the vote on one item, in what seems to be partisan sharing of items with Democrats as much as 24 hours before sharing them with Republicans on another is particularly concerning. Regardless of political affiliation, commissioners must be given adequate and equal time to consider the items on which they're going to vote. Let us all hope that such incidents of favoritism and selective sharing are isolated and not emblematic of the chairman's new operating procedure.

Additionally, I continue to be concerned with the commission's ongoing defiance of its statutory obligations to complete the 2010 quadrennial review of media ownership rules. Despite the commission's woefully outdated record on this issue, it has nonetheless moved forward with changes that effectively bar joint sales agreements and change commission treatment of shared service agreements under its media attribution rules. These actions, in the absence of the statutorily required media ownership review, do raise significant questions about the commission's commitment to making decisions informed by facts and utilizing sound process.

And, lastly, I am troubled by the chairman's insistence on attempting to regulate the Internet under rules that were informed by 19th Century railroad regs, and adopted to regulate the monopoly telephone network of the past. The Internet has indeed flourished under the current light touch regulatory scheme, and subjecting to burdensome regs is a leap in the wrong direction. Title II is inappropriate for the Internet, and attempting to reclassify it would be harmful to consumers, businesses and the future of the Internet as we know it. Nobody wants telephone service to look like it did in 1984, and we certainly shouldn't wish for our Internet access to return to that rotary phone era either. The communications sector is vital to our national economy and commission auction - action on even small items can have broad impact. I thank Chairman Wheeler for being here today. Look forward to working together toward a bipartisan, measured, transparent and responsible actions that do benefit consumers, job creation and our economy. And I yield my balance of my time to be split between Mr. Latta and Mr. Barton.

LATTA: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman for yielding and Chairman Walden I appreciate you holding this hearing today, and welcome Chairman Wheeler. Thanks for being here.

The communications and technology industry is heralded as a vibrant, dynamic and productive sector of our economy. This is not by accident, as networks and services transition to IP based platforms, they've had the flexibility to grow, advance and evolve in large part because they have not been subjected to the stifling hand of legacy government regulation. We've pursued a light touch regulatory approach to the Internet ecosystem, because we've seen time and again, that it serves as a catalyst for increased investment, innovation, job creation and competition.

As I look forward to develop policies that would further this growth, we'd be remiss to overlook the significance of how regulatory restraint has been fundamental - a fundamental component of the industry's success. That's why I'm concerned with some of the proposals emerging from the FCC, particularly in consideration of reclassifying broadband Internet access service, telecommunications service under Title II of the Communications Act. This policy would be an extreme exercise of government overreach and likely result in failed websites, downgraded and poor customer service, less choice and flexibility for consumers, businesses and stifling of innovation through regulation.

Unwanted attempts to manufacture and shape markets outcomes propose solutions in search of problems impose antiquated regulation will frustrate future progress and innovation. I intend to introduce legislation that prevents the FCC from following through on this misguided regulatory proposal. Mr. Chairman, with that I yield back the balance of my time. And I yield to Mr. Barton.

BARTON: (AUDIO GAP) We just welcomed Chairman Wheeler and the question before the committee today are we soon going to be calling him Mr. Wheeler Dealer? With that, I - I'll put my statement in the record in the interest of time, and yield back to the chairman.

WALDEN: Thank you, Chairman. Gentleman yields back. Now turn to the gentleman from California, Mr. Waxman for opening comments.

WAXMAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I want to welcome back Chairman Wheeler. The Federal Communications Commission had a historic week last week. You are tackling some of the most complex and pressing issues in the communications sector today.

In 2012, Congress gave the FCC a big job: create the world's first incentive auction to ensure that beachfront, low band spectrum is put to its highest economic value, and you established the ground rules for this crucial auction last week. You had a hard job, because you needed to balance four potential - potentially conflicting objectives. One, maximizing the amount of spectrum made available for auction. Two, promote competition. Three, create bands of unlicensed spectrum to spur innovation. And, four, raise money. It appears you hit this one out of the ballpark.

I particularly want to commend you for your work to advance unlicensed spectrum. Your plan will create three channels of beachfront, unlicensed spectrum throughout the nation. The vision of new, super Wi-Fi can now become a reality.

I also want to commend you for promoting competition, by reserving spectrum for competitive carriers. It would be an enormous setback for innovation and consumers if the incentive auction turns the wireless market into a duopoly, dominated by Verizon and AT&T. This auction is the best, and possibly the last, chance the FCC has to invigorate competition.

I would have preferred if you reserved even more spectrum for competitive carriers, but I recognize the pressures you are under and your need to secure three votes. By the way, you may hear arguments today from Republicans on this committee that you lack the authority to promote competition. These claims are nonsense and contradict the express language of the statute.

Last week you also launched the FCC's third attempt in eight years to protect the Open Internet. You didn't hit this one out of the park, but you didn't need to, either. You made a wide decision to solicit comment on a wide range of options. As I wrote you, this time has come to - wrote you, the time has come to end the legal gymnastics and stop the lobbying games being played by the big broadband providers.

In 2010, Verizon, AT&T and Comcast pled with the FCC not to use its undisputed authority under Title II of the Communications Act. And, then, after FCC did what they wanted, Verizon sued the agency for lacking authority when the FCC agreed with the company. This time, you need a different approach. You should use your Title II authority as a backstop authority to protect the Open Internet. If you want to proceed under Section 706, as your main legal theory that's fine. But you shouldn't water down the Open Internet rules to fit Section 706. Instead, you should get the substance right, and invoke Title II as an independent basis of authority.

The FCC has already lost two rulings in court over the Open Internet. You don't have to choose between weak rules and a weak legal case. You can issue strong rules, and have a strong legal case, if you use a belt and suspender approach to the next rule making. I look forward to exploring this issue with you further in the question period. In the meantime, I want to yield the balance of my time to my friend and colleague, Congresswoman Matsui.

MATSUI: Thank you very much, Ranking Member Waxman, for yielding me time and welcome, Chairman Wheeler. The FCC certainly has a lot on its plate. The commission is considering net neutrality rules, rules on the broadcast incentive auction, the AWS-III auction, USF and E- Rate reforms in two very significant mergers. I'm confident the FCC will be able to demonstrate that it can walk and chew gum at the same time.

This subcommittee should also do its part. For one, I join in calling for the chairman to hold oversight hearings on the two proposed mergers between Comcast and Time Warner. And on AT&T and DirecTV. Both are some of the largest mergers in our nation's telecommunications history. Americans, including many in my district of Sacramento, are seeing the trends towards consolidation, content and peering deals, and how they hear phrases like, paid prioritization, and wondering what is going on? What does all this mean for them, for competition and for the economy?

It has been encouraging that so many Americans are speaking up in support of protecting an Open Internet. I was one who thought the FCC should have taken more time to deliberate on what net neutrality rules the commission should propose. But we are where we are. The proposal has certainly improved over the last few weeks. It is still far from perfect. I support a ban on paid prioritization deals. We can't afford a two tiered Internet system.

I look forward from hearing from you today, and I yield back the balance of my time.

WALDEN: Gentlelady yields back the balance of her time. And with that, you've heard from us, or at least a few of us up here, Mr. Chairman. Now, we're delighted to have you here, and we look forward to your - your opening statement and comments. And thank you, again, for the work you're doing. Go ahead.

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and members of the - of the committee. As you've pointed out, it's been about six months since we last sat down. And what I wanted to do was to highlight some of the things that we have done in that period, and then engage in a dialogue with you with whatever topics that you would like to address.

As has been evidenced by a lot of these comments up here, one of the principal responsibilities of - of the commission is dealing with the spectrum crunch. And we have taken a significant step forward in terms of getting more spectrum out to the market. We had the H Block auction, which raised a billion and a half dollars for 10 MHz spectrum. We have opened a new 100MHz swath in the 5GHz band, which is already being referred to as gigabyte Wi-Fi, because of the incredible throughput that it enables.

We have begun a proceeding on spectrum sharing in 3.5 GHz, and we announced yesterday that in accord with the mandate of this committee and Congress to auction off AWS-III spectrum. That we will begin the auction on November 13th, and we will finish as per your mandate February - we will license February 22, 2015.

We have also, as some of the committee had noted established a new set of mobile spectrum holding rules, which have been praised by everybody from public interest groups to small operators, to large operators as - as was commented by Mr. Waxman, hitting the ball out of the park. And we have begun the incentive auction process. It's - you mandated us as - as you've said, with a non-trivial task. And we have - we have taken the first important steps to that.

On the question of universal service and what's going on there, we have fulfilled the pledge that I made to this committee last time we were together, to eliminate the infamous quantile regression analysis. And, we're seeking comments on what its replacement should be. We have funded the Connect America fund to provide connectivity to five million more Americans who do not have access to broadband today. That's about a third of the total, and a significant bite out of - out of that. And we're seeking input on multiple additional issues: throughput standards, should we, as - as technology increases and bandwidth increases, do we need to think about higher bandwidth that is supported by the Connect America fund? How do we best deal with the mobile component of broadband delivery in Connect America? And how best to support broadband for rate of return carriers? Those are all proceedings that we have underway.

We have - we have made some significant strides, also, in the area of public safety. We took a good chunk out of the FirstNet $7.5 billion with the H-Band auction. Expect, obviously, that the AWS-III auction will do more and I wouldn't be surprised if we show up at the incentive auction having met the requirement, or at least taking a huge bite out of the requirement for funding FirstNet.

We had a rule making on text to 911, you know, phones aren't used just for talking anymore, but texting and - and so if you want to text to an emergency service provider, we had a rule making on that, the major carriers stepped up and literally in the last couple of days, they all met their goals for implementation on that, which is a terrific step forward. And we've also initiated a further notice on location accuracy, because as wireless usage increases and particularly as it replaces what's - wired line connections inside, and as GPS usage has increased, there's been a fascinating reality that location accuracy has actually declined. And, we've got a notice going on how do we address that, because that's literally a matter of life and death.

As you mentioned we began the 2014 quadrennial review on media issues with a - an expedited delivery date. We closed a loophole that was being exploited to get around the ownership rules, using joint services agreement, and we brought competition back to the retransmission consent negotiations. We have also continued to press on the reform issues that so many of you and I share in common as being important.

Last time we were together, I told you we stood up a task force to deal with this. That task force came back with 154 recommendations. About three quarters of those are now well along their way to being in process. They kind of break into two parts. There are procedural issues that you might associate with administrative procedure act, and things like this. And there's also just how do you make the agency more efficient?

And last week, as many have discussed, we opened a Notice of Proposed Rulemaking on preserving and protecting the Open Internet. It's important to recognize that there are no protections for an Open Internet in place today. The January court decision affirmed the commission's authority under Section 706 to deal with the Open Internet, and identified what I call a road map for how to achieve that. And what I have proposed in a method that follows that road map.

I understand that there is a great debate on this issue. I heard the debate here this morning. Between those who say there is no need and those who say it ought to be a regulated utility. What we have tried to do is to follow the court's direction, the road map, the blueprint, and to come up with a proposal that stops blocking, that prohibits anything that degrades a consumer's access, including prioritization. That asks a broader question about prioritization as to whether it should be banned outright, and if so, how, and then engages in the discussion that we've heard already this morning about Title II versus 706, and collecting a broad scope of learned information on that.

I've consistently said that there is only one Internet. There's not a fast Internet and a slow Internet. There's not special service Internet and non. There is one Internet, and the - when the consumer buys access to the Internet, they are buying access to the full Internet. And that's what our rules attempt to protect. This has become a debate among legal approaches - about legal approaches.

It's a healthy debate. It's a debate that our Notice of Proposed Rulemaking furthers with multiple requests for input, but my position has been similar to that of the Consumer Federation of America, and that is that we ought to explore the powers that are granted in the '96 act, specifically Section 706, keep asking how Title II fits in, but develop a regulatory policy that looks forward not backward, because what we need is a regulatory plan for the 21st Century. And I look forward to discussing that with you, Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee.

WALDEN: Mr. Wheeler, chairman, thank you for being here. We appreciate your work, and - and your willingness to come and spend some time with us and - and respond to our questions.

I want to pick up on the Middle Class Tax Relief Act, which as you know, was designed to create a forum where broadcasters could volunteer their spectrum up for auction, for mobile broadband use. Never been done quite like proposed, and you've got, we - we all knew that going in, but it seemed like a good balance. The critical term in all of this was that the broadcasters would volunteer to put their spectrum up, they wouldn't be forced into it. That was the agreement. Yet, many of the actions that we've seen coming out of the commission would lead some to believe that the FCC might be bulling broadcasters into giving up spectrum without providing hard data and clear models so that the broadcasters can thoroughly and thoughtfully deliberate and choose to participate or not in this first of its kind auction.

Let me tell you what I'm - I'm thinking here. For example, the joint sales agreements that are now outlawed. These agreements essentially offer broadcasters a viable business model in small markets that would otherwise suffer from lack of service. You're considering the attribution value of UHF stations, such that more broadcasters could end up in violation of that the national cap under the broadcast ownership rule, and the FCC has failed to process broadcasters' petitions for allocation changes from VHF to UHF, even though the petitions were filed prior to Middle Class Tax Relief Act.

And, finally, you're seeking to use a modified version of OET-69. I'm hearing about this to repack broadcasters. This will likely result in reduced coverage for broadcasters that choose to stay in the business, making the business itself less viable. So ,the very people you're trying to incent to put spectrum, so that it'll be available for auction, I think are - are concerned about where the commission's headed in a number of areas. Can you explain to me how these actions will actually encourage broadcasters to participate in this auction?

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think the goal here, that we have been trying to follow, is - is not to discourage or to encourage, but to follow through with our responsibilities. And - and that means enforcing and updating our rules ...

WALDEN: Do you think any of these, though, do you think any of these things I've just cited encourage broadcasters to participate more? If you don't have broadcasters showing up with spectrum ...

WHEELER: So, I -I, as I said, Mr. Chairman, I -I don't think that we have an important, as you said, an important and historic role. This is an incentive auction.

WALDEN: I'm aware of that. Yes.

WHEELER: What we have tried to do in the mobile spectrum holdings rule, for instance, is to encourage broadcasters -encourage, I'm sorry, wireless carriers to buy, which creates the incentive. The interesting thing, there was a -a report by one of the Wall Street analysts last week who said we expect the greatest risk to this auction, broadcasters not showing up, just dropped. Because the fact that AT&T suggested that they're ready to bid between $9 and $18 billion ...

WALDEN: Right.

WHEELER: ...for 20 to 40MHz, this analyst said should send positive signals to broadcasters. So, our goal is to...

WALDEN: All right ...

WHEELER: ...is to create this marketplace and we're not trying to take regulatory action ...

WALDEN: All right, well ...

WHEELER: in -in unrelated areas that would ...

WALDEN: But you are taking lots of regulatory actions, and it does have an effect on the marketplace. I mean, those two are facts. (AUDIO GAP) If -if we don't have these broadcasters coming to the table voluntarily, there won't be spectrum available. So, I want to steal a line from the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, and that this one I refer to as Mr. Dingle, to see if I can get, just sort of some yes or nos here. Will you commit that the FCC will not score television stations based on their (AUDIO GAP). That's yes, actually. That you will commit that you will not score it. Will you commit the FCC, is that correct?

WHEELER: Yes.

WALDEN: Yes. You will commit the FCC will ensure that broadcasters' cost to reallocate are covered by the $1.75 billion relocation fund?

WHEELER: We believe that that fund will be adequate. That's - that's ....

WALDEN: OK.

WHEELER: ...that's what Congress told us to spend. Period.

WALDEN: And will you commit to completing frequency coordination with Canada and Mexico before the auction? WHEELER: I think the issue there is what is the term complete? As you know on the DTV transition it never came down to actual signing on paper, but we understood where each other were, and I am very confident that we will be at that kind of a point.

WALDEN: Because that's critical. And will you commit to revoking only those low powered TV and translator licenses that are necessary to complete the auction?

WHEELER: Yes.

WALDEN: Thank you. And, I think I'm out of time. So, with that, I would now yield to the gentlelady, my friend from California, Miss Eshoo.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. A lot of things to discuss, but I want to bore down on, or bore into some of the particulars on your recent proposal relative to -to the Internet, on net neutrality. I've argued, many advocates for net neutrality have argued that paid prioritization represents a fundamental departure from the Internet as we know it. I -I'm just kind of restating what is obvious, but I think that when you have hundreds of thousands of people communicating from across the country to you on it, that it is -that it's important to raise. Now, as a policy, not as a legal question, do you think that paid prioritization should be blocked outright?

WHEELER: So, I have said, Congresswoman, that I don't believe there ought to have and have nots.

ESHOO: No, no, just answer my question.

WHEELER: That -- that -that ...

ESHOO: Just tell me. Do you think that it should be blocked outright?

WHEELER: We have asked that question in the rulemaking. And - and what I have said is that I believe that under Section 706, anything that is anti-competitive or anti-consumer is competitively unreasonable and therefore can and should be blocked. And that becomes the trigger for how you deal with paid prioritization.

ESHOO: Yes, now what happens ...

WHEELER: On the question of per se that you asked...

ESHOO: Yes.

WHEELER: ...we've specifically asked how and whether.

ESHOO: Now, what happens if the FCC determines that there's no outright -no way to outright -create an outright ban, and these paid agreements under 706, where does that leave you? Where does that leave the country?

WHEELER: So - so when the court gave us our instructions, they talked about what they called the virtuous cycle, and that is that - that content drives the need for conduit, which then creates the opportunity for content. And that this cycle is what it is our responsibility to protect. And that's - that's what 706 authorizes us to protect. And so what my proposal is is that we take them up on that. And we say if there is something that interferes with that virtuous cycle, which I believe paid prioritization does, that then we can move against it.

ESHOO: Yes. All right. But, now let's move over to Title II. Title II is described, it depends on who's describing it, it's either a scourge --it's been compared to the early railroad regulations in our country - to being the flip side, you know, the savior title. I talked about in my opening statement about the - the - one of the imprimaturs of the Internet has been consistent innovation. And, while there are those that, and I understand why people would move to Title II, because they want the Internet protected, and these values are -they're worth protecting. But I also believe that there is room for, in Title II, for heavy handed regulation, and I don't think that, well, let me put it this way, I think that we need a light but strengthful legal touch in this. Because the values are so essential, and people across the country, and in the world, I mean, I'm hearing from people from different parts of the world as well, are calling for these protections. How would you envision - how would you handle constraint under Title II?

WHEELER: Well ...

ESHOO: In terms of being the chief regulator?

WHEELER: So, as you know ...

ESHOO: Have you given thought to this?

WHEELER: Pardon me?

ESHOO: Have you given thought to this?

WHEELER: Yes, ma'am.

ESHOO: OK.

WHEELER: And -and as you know ...

ESHOO: As some people say share it with me.

WHEELER: As you know Title II, there is nothing in Title II that prohibits paid prioritization. As a matter of fact we have all kinds of paid prioritization exists ...

ESHOO: You're ...

WHEELER: ...today.

ESHOO: You're worrying me by bringing that up first. But anyway, go ahead.

WHEELER: So -so that, no, because it goes to you, I think, the root question of yours which is how do you forbear from that?

ESHOO: Yes.

WHEELER: OK? And - and so - so it is possible to go through and say, yes, we will not do this, we will not do this, we will not do this. In the - in the wireless context, interestingly enough, Congress created that - created wireless as a common carrier, but then specifically said but this doesn't apply, and this doesn't apply, and this doesn't apply.

ESHOO: Yes.

WHEELER: We can do that as a commission, as well. It has been proposed that that's an approach to take. There are also those who throw up their hands and ooh in great concern over that because they say, OK, well this commission may do this, but what about the next commission? And you can't bind a future commission by making those kinds of - of determinations. So, what we have done in this NPRM is to ask the specific question about here's Section 706, here's Title II, let's compare them and contrast them with each other, and tell us what the pluses and minuses and the best ways to get through this are? And I think that leads us to the kind of answer that you're asking for today.

WALDEN: The gentlelady's time's expired. We'll go now to the gentlelady from Tennessee, Miss Blackburn, the Vice Chair of the full committee, for her questions.

BLACKBURN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And Mr. Wheeler, we thank you for taking the time to come and be with us. You've got a feisty term going over there, at the FCC, and in Tennessee we would say you're kicking up a little dust. And, it's causing concern.

Many of our content creators have a tremendous amount of concern about your approach, and many of our health care innovators, who are looking at apps in telemedicine concepts and things of that nature, are also expressing concern. And I think that probably your actions have inserted a good bit of uncertainty into the innovation sector that is looking at how we best utilize all things Internet to - for quality of life and access for economic development for health care, for - for innovation and I've got just a couple of simple questions for you.

First of all, on cost benefit analysis, and I thank you that last night your team sent a letter over to us on that question, but what concerns me was that in the letter you say that this is just a tool. Cost benefit analysis is just one of many tools that would go into your decision. And your NPRM does not include an initial cost benefit analysis, and your predecessor, Mr. Genachowski, in this committee came before us and assured us he was going to use this and I'm actually going to read you his statement that he gave to us. He said, during my tenure I brought particular focus to this process, including the - by directing the early involvement of our chief economist and the analytical process of rulemaking, and by having FCC staff consult with the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs on best practices in conducting cost benefit analysis. And I - I think it is an incredibly important component of this, to look at what the cost of net neutrality rules would be to the consumer, and also to industry, so I want to know from you: are you going to give us a commitment right now that you will conduct a thorough and extensive cost benefit analysis of the actual cost to the consumer and to industry on these rules?

WHEELER: Thank you, Ms. Blackburn, I agree that cost benefit analysis are crucial to decision making. And in this rulemaking we specifically ask what are the costs of one approach or another? And what are the benefits, one or another? So that we can collect that information and have that kind of analysis. I agree with the importance of cost benefit analysis.

BLACKBURN: OK. Let me ask you this, also. You know, the commission's fund really comes from those that are regulated by the FCC, but we have some that are not. They're impacted by this, but they are not regulated and paying those fees, so in the net neutrality context, for example, companies like Google and Netflix want the FCC to act on their behalf, and petition or visit the agency, if you will, in support of those efforts, but they free ride because they are not paying the fees and bearing that part of the regulatory burden. So, since they seem so ready and willing to rely on regulation to help them, with their business models, how would you recommend that those entities share in the cost, pay their part of the costs, funding the agency?

WHEELER: With all respect, that's above my pay grade. That's a decision that - that this committee and the Congress can make in setting those rules ...

BLACKBURN: I'm asking for what your recommendation would be? They come and they lobby you, and ...

WHEELER: So ...

BLACKBURN: ...and they're pushing the net neutrality rules, and while they may like what you are saying, because they want you to step in, we have a lot of people out there who are paying the fees that are not in favor of what you are doing, and we have a lot of innovators who are not in favor of what you are doing, and your door has the name chairman on it, so I'm asking what is your perspective?

WHEELER: So, our - our effort in all of this is to represent the American people, not company a or company b. We have been told by the Congress, from whom we can collect regulatory fees and we do. If there is a decision that we should collect regulatory fees from somebody else, that's something we obviously will take. If there is a decision that we should expand regulatory authority over other entities, that's obviously something we should do. But that is a decision that is out of our hands.

BLACKBURN: I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back. The chairman recognizes the gentlelady from California, Miss Matsui, for her questions. MATSUI: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Chairman Wheeler, I'd like to understand, given the success of the Internet and the absence of prioritization, precisely what types of paid prioritization you believe will speed the deployment and adoption of broadband Internet access services? Given that paid prioritization agreements would be used as a barrier of entry to startup and small business, what prioritization arrangements, specifically, will be better for the Internet than the no prioritization norm we have today?

WHEELER: What we are trying to do in this item is to say that anything that affects that virtuous cycle that the court talked about, and I talked about before, is not appropriate. Is unlawful. And that would include paid prioritization. Now, the court told us to look at this on a case by case basis. We have asked the question in the rulemaking as to whether we should look at it generically, and say it's all out. And we're soliciting comments on that. But, you know, the concept of paid prioritization when I buy Internet access, I am buying the full pipe. I am buying access to everything that's out there, and if somebody comes along and says, oh, no, you can't get this unless you pay more, that's unreasonable, and should be banned. If somebody comes along and says to a content provider, you can't get on unless you pay more, that's unreasonable and that would not be permitted.

MATSUI: OK, well. You know, as for my part, other than public - public safety, I believe paid prioritization should be banned. I also think another concern here is the last mile equivalent we're seeing in peering. The fact that there's so much uncertainty with paid prioritization is troublesome. If this concept moves forward, we could inadvertently block the next Google or Amazon from the market without even knowing it. I'm concerned that your hands may be tied here. Even if the commission wanted to ban anti-competitive paid prioritization deals, you may not have the authority or tools to do so.

Chairman Wheeler, if you were to explain to my constituents what is occurring in the market right now with the two mergers, content and peering agreements, and now paid prioritization could be legitimized under a commercially reasonable standard. What would you tell them? Not just what it means for them, but also for competition and for economy as a whole

WHEELER: I would tell them that I felt that paid prioritization was commercially unreasonable, and therefore could be dealt with. And, that, on the question of peering, that that is a separate issue that the commission needs to look at and will be looking at. But I would emphasize that I am strong supporter of the Open Internet.

And I would also tell them a story that when I was an entrepreneur, I was shut out of cable systems, because they were closed networks. And, I would come with a new product and couldn't get on. And, then when I was a venture capitalist, before taking this job, that the companies that I was backing had to have access to the Internet, could only succeed if they had access to the Internet. So, I would say to them that I believe in an Open Internet. I've experienced closed networks and the harm they cause to innovation, and that I want to protect and preserve an Open Internet.

MATSUI: you know, I think this is a very critical time. When I have ordinary people, probably (ph) off the street, coming to me and asking me about all these things they've heard, because people today really depend on the Internet. Ordinary citizens, the entrepreneurs who are concerned about this, and who else we know - we may not know out there. So, it's very concerning to all of us that there is a potential that we may have a situation where we won't have an Open Internet. And I would also like you to consider some of these mergers. I mean, we feel like we're kind of in the Wild West of the digital economy now. And now with mergers coming forward. Can you commit to us, these large mergers that are before us, they may be different from each other, but can you commit to us here that the FCC will carefully scrutinize these deals? With a focus toward public interest?

WHEELER: Without hesitation. And with complete affirmation.

MATSUI: OK, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: Chair now recognizes former chairman of the full committee, Mr. Barton, for his questions.

BARTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I want to echo the last question you asked Chairman Wheeler about low powered television. You and I are working on a bill, hopefully, to give them some protection. We understand that under current law they - they - they don't have standing when they repackage, but we hope to give them some at least priority or some help if and when we do do these repackaging of the spectrums. So I wanted to commend you for that last question.

I've listened Chairman Wheeler, to my friends on the Democratic side repeatedly talk about the Open Internet and whether you should try to regulate it under Section 706 or Title II. I think you're asking a false question. The Internet is open.

The question is what does the FCC do in terms of monitoring to make sure that it stays open? And, the analogy I'm going to use is not perfect, but I think it is instructive and educational. The airways that we fly back and forth from Washington to our districts are open, but they are regulated and monitored for a number of reasons by the FAA. If I call up American Airlines, and I say, I want to go from Washington -Reagan to DFW, they quote me a price, let's say it's $350 one way. But when I show up with my ticket, I get one seat on that plane. I don't' get to take a hundred of my friends, and put them on the plane with me because I happen to buy the ticket first, and show up first.

BARTON: So, it's obvious that it would be great for $350 if I could fill the plane.

But we allow the airlines to price by volume. You want one ticket, it's $350. You want two tickets, it's $700. Maybe if you want to buy the whole plane, they do give you a discount. It's only $250, but we don't let the first person to buy the ticket use the whole plane for $350.

And for all the bold talk about open access, what people are really trying to do is, you know, I want to pay a minimum price and get all this broadband, and I want to download everything from Netflix, and I don't want to pay if I download every movie they rent, or vice versa.

Netflix pays a basic price, and they can service 10 million people, instead of whatever it would be. So, you know, this -- this -- the broadband providers who have spent billions and billions of dollars, and have -- have networked this country and provided access through the competitive market principles, are not going to somehow, all of a sudden decide, as long as the FCC, which under your chairmanship, makes sure that it stays a competitive model.

They're -- they're going to continue to provide an open internet, but they may want to provide based on volume of use, some sort of a pricing system that allocates that it isn't a limited spectrum.

I see no reason to try to shoehorn some sort of a regulatory approach into either Title II, or Section 706, you know. Explain to me why my approach, which is what we've been doing and which works, is the wrong approach.

WHEELER: Let me see if I can respond to both parts of your question. First, on LPTV, we -- as I said to the chairman, we do not want to move those who don't have to be moved as part of it.

We also believe that there is opportunities to go to digital and the new efficiencies that that brings, just like it did in the -- in the Class A stations. And thirdly, we're opening a new rulemaking to specifically deal with that. So because we agree with the importance of low power and -- and translators.

To your -- to the second part of your question, let me take the chairman's hat off, and put my consumer hat on for a second, because two weekends ago, I called my ISP, and increased my capacity, because I wanted faster true plan (ph). And they said for another $10 a month, we'll give you another, what turned out to be like, 20 MB. That's a marketplace transaction. That's something that's accepted now. That is not something that is part of the open internet rules.

What the open internet rules are trying to say, is that when I buy that capacity, I've bought that ride to every place on the internet, that somebody can't turn around and say oh, but you can't get that, or somebody can't turn around and say well, you can deliver that, Tom, but you've got to pay me an extra fee.

And so the concept of the open internet is that I have bought this broad pathway, and I have the right to use it, unfettered, in a -- on an open basis, and that's what we're trying to deliver in this rulemaking.

BARTON: I'm not -- my time's expired. I'm not trying to oppose that, but if you want -- you're looking at it from the consumer standpoint, that everybody should have access, but if you are a provider of content, you should be willing to pay more based on the number of items you're going to put at any given time on the open internet, so that everybody has access to it.

Because if you have a constrained pipeline, somebody has to make a decision how you put things into the pipeline, whether it's the airplane, or whether it's the airways, or the internet. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I yield back.

WALDEN: Gentleman yields back, the chair now recognizes the former chairman on the Democratic side, Mr. Waxman.

CHAIRMAN HENRY WAXMAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Chairman Wheeler, I commended your leadership earlier in my opening statement, about the spectrum auction, so I want to ask questions about a different subject, and that's net neutrality.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

WAXMAN: I commend you for tackling this issue, and for seeking comment on a broad range of issues, but I have serious concerns about some proposals that have been discussed. You've said that there would be presumption against broadband providers like Verizon, AT&T, and Comcast, entering into arrangements that give exclusive advantage, to their affiliates. Is that right?

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

WAXMAN: OK. What I don't understand, is why this presumption against exclusive arrangements would be limited to affiliates. Suppose Netflix entered into an exclusive arrangement with AT&T or Comcast for faster speeds for its videos that block competitors like Amazon Prime, from getting similar service.

I think that would be a serious threat to competition and an open internet, yet your proposal does not create a presumption against these exclusive arrangements. Why would you allow any exclusive arrangement that guarantees some content providers faster speeds than competitors can access?

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Waxman. This goes to the -- back to this virtuous (ph) cycle that the court talked about, and you know, it was interesting, yesterday in the Wall Street Journal, there was an article that interviewed a bunch of infrastructure manufacturers about the impact on that neutrality.

And they flat out said that if you offer fast lanes for some, you're going to degrade service for others. And I think that's at the heart of what you're talking about here. That would be commercially unreasonable under our proposal.

WAXMAN: OK. The problem with exclusive arrangements is they would let some companies block their competition from similar advantages. In markets where there are -- there is no, or only limited choices of broadband providers, that would stifle openness and competition.

I just want to say to you that I'm opposed to any form of paid prioritization. Paid prioritization divides the internet into the haves and the have-nots, and it will entrench the big companies at the expense of startups.

My understanding is that you've asked comment on a multi-factor test for determining whether -- determining when paid prioritization is permissible, and when it would be prohibited. My concern is that this will create a lot of ambiguity, and a lot of litigation.

I believe right lines would be much better for the market, and for innovation, so I'm going to ask you to consider a presumption against all paid prioritization as you develop final rules. Will you -- will you agree to consider this option?

WHEELER: Absolutely, and we have asked in the NPRM (ph) specifically whether, and if so, how do you accomplish it? So that is -- that is a ripe debate that is in the NPRM right now, sir.

WAXMAN: My understanding is that the reason you had proposed a complicated, multi-factored test, is concern about the court ruling. And I agree that if you're limited to acting under section 706, your options could be limited.

But if you are not limited to Section 706, you could establish a presumption against paid prioritization under Title II, and that's why it's so important for us -- for you to use your Title II authority as back stop authority.

You don't have to settle for a weak open internet rules if you exercise your full powers. And I'm glad you're looking at that possibility. Let me close by thanking you for seeking comment on the back stop proposal in the proposal adopted last week.

I'm committed to working with you to ensure the commission adopts strong and open internet protections for consumers and innovators, while encouraging continued investment in the online content and services we all rely on and enjoy today. I think it's important that we get the substance right. We tried three times, we meaning you, at the FCC, because of the concern that the consumer have full access to what is on the internet, and full access to be able to use the internet to its greatest and maximum potential, and I would hate to see that net neutrality in any way be diminished if we have an opportunity under the law, as we look at it, to make sure that we get the substance right.

WALDEN: Thank you.

WAXMAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back his time, and now turn to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, the vice chair of the subcommittee, Mr. Latta.

LATTA: Well thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and again, Chairman Wheeler, thanks very much again for being here. There has been some discussion on Title II, and I'd like to follow up on some of that questioning.

Central premise of Title II regulation always been that the regulation was a substitute for competition. And two parts with a question, then. What types of findings have the commission made to justify entertaining the idea of Title II regulation of the internet?

And then do you believe the SEC should have to make a specific showing that of a market failure reform proposing rate regulation, or reporting requirements, that are the precursor to rate regulation?

WHEELER: So again, this -- these are the kinds of questions that we have tried assiduously not to decide on, but to ask about in this rulemaking. We're going to have to make a decision on exactly those questions at some point in time.

But what we want to achieve, is a record that gives everybody the opportunity to opine on that, so that we can be appropriately informed.

LATTA: Well let me ask you, what's your time line on that, then?

WHEELER: So we've got 60 days for comments, and then 45 days for reply comments.

LATTA: OK, so are you saying then that you're not ruling out rate regulation?

WHEELER: I'm saying we have asked the question about Title II, and -- and the full panoply of Title II. Yes, sir.

LATTA: OK, well -- let me ask you this, what have you been hearing from the community thus far, especially when you're saying that you are asking those questions, what have you -- what have you been hearing out there?

WHEELER: Excuse me. Well we have -- we've heard very little on the record thus far. There has been a great outpouring of people speaking to us through the press, people speaking to us through letters, and this sort of thing.

And as I indicated at the outset, there are two, diametrically opposed positions. One is that you should not do anything, and the other is that it should go all the way to being regulated like a public utility.

And our job is to find that which is best for consumers and best for encouraging investment in the internet, which itself is best for consumers.

LATTA: Let me go on with this question, while you've resolved some of the issues in the 5 GHz rulemaking, there are number of issues outstanding that have the potential to open up another 195 MHz of spectrum for unlicensed use. What is the FCC's and your plan for tackling the open issues?

WHEELER: In the 5 GHz?

LATTA: Right.

WHEELER: So there's -- there's -- actually think about 5 GHz, and 3 bytes. The first byte we've -- we've dealt with. That's the lower end of 5 GHz. In the middle component of 5 GHz, there are lots of national defense kind of activities, radar, and this sort of thing.

And the question is how can you work out sharing arrangements there? And we're working with those parties. On the upper end, is where you have spectrum that has been identified for intelligent traffic, ITFS, kinds of activities.

And that is based around the 802.11 standard. There are strong feelings about the need to protect that. I believe that it's possible to work together to meet both sets of needs, since it's based around a common 802.11 standard.

LATTA: Yeah, and in my remaining time, let me ask this last question, the SEC's 2011 universal service transformation, or transformation order, requires phone companies to set minimum prices that they can charge their consumers if they -- if the provider wants to continue receiving the same amount of funds from the US (inaudible) to support the high cost of the business.

So as a result, many of our rural consumers, the lot that I represent out there, will see the rate forward (ph) go from $14 to about $20.46. And while the communications act requires rural rates to be reasonably comparable to rates in urban areas, as affordable, reasonably comparable does not necessarily mean that the rural rate should be exactly the same as the urban rate when the rural customer might be able to call, only a few thousand people locally want urban call many times more than that.

And then should the rate be the same in the rural areas where the average income is significantly lower than it might in fact not be as affordable. The rate floor continues to be a concern for many of our telecommunications providers in my district, and other servicing rural America, where I understand that the SEC has agree to phase in the increase at $2.00 per year, and proposed a start date until -- or postponed that start date until after 2015.

Can you explain why the FCC interprets the reasonably comparable rates to mean exactly the same rates between urban and rural areas, considering the smaller pipe (ph) relation of rural calling areas, and in fact, that it was what is affordable in the largest urban areas is not what is also affordable to consumers in the rural.

WHEELER: Thank you. I'm glad you asked that question, it's an important question. The -- so -- so, as you stated, we're supposed to make sure that things are reasonably comparable. The reason for that is to make sure that the subsidies that some Americans are paying to deliver service to other Americans, don't end up being subsidies that some Americans are paying to reduce the bills of other Americans, but to overcome the high cost of getting it to them.

In some instances, it has been unfortunately the former, there are in 16 states, there are situations where consumers are paying -- some consumers are paying $5.00 a month for telephone service, because they're being subsidized by people in your district and other districts.

We need to get our arms around that. So what we've done, is to say OK, step 1 is Jack (ph) goes into effect January 15. Then what we're going to do is -- and that can't be more than $2.00 by the way.

And then what we're going to do is go back out with another survey that hits the kind of granularity you were talking about in terms of service, including long distance and these kinds of things, so that we have a better understanding of exactly what comparable means, and then lock at that issue again.

LATTA: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My time has expired and I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back. The chair now recognizes chairman emeritus of the committee, the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Dingell.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, I thank you for your courtesy, and I commend you for holding this hearing. I'd like to welcome our old friend, Mr. Wheeler, back, fine public servant, and we're looking forward to good things of him.

Mr. Chairman, last week's open meeting, the commission adopted a number of big ticket items, including a new net neutrality NPRM, and draft rules for the upcoming incentive auction of broadcaster spectrum.

Concerning the former, I commend you for your efforts to keep the internet open, and will be watching the matter closely, as it goes forward. It's my hope the commission will work with this committee to ensure that any final action it takes to conform to its statutory authority, especially concerning Title II reclassification. Now with respect to the incentive auction, I am interested in what the committee intends to do about treating broadcasters fairly. My questions will require a simple yes or no answer.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, I'd like to begin with a parochial matter. Section 6403 B1 of the middle class tax relief and job creation act specifies that the commission may, subject to international (inaudible) along the border with Mexico and Canada, reassign and relocate and reallocate broadcast frequencies. Is that correct?

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Now Chairman Wheeler, in the commission's joy (ph) to 2013 response to my letter of inquiry about the reverse auction, Gary Epstein, head of the commission's incentive auction taskforce stated the following, the language used in section 6403 B1 of the action is quote, identical to that used by the commission in describing its handling of the earlier DTV transition, in which the commission adopted our proposed allotments for these statements, subject to our continuing negotiations with Canada, notwithstanding the broadcaster's request.

To the contrary, one here could reasonably assume, based on the statement, that the commission may reassign and reallocate broadcast frequencies pursuant to the act, while negotiations with Canada and Mexico are still ongoing. Is that correct?

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: I'm going to ask you to submit for the record how you're going to assure protection to the broadcasters and the viewers in that process.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Now Mr. Wheeler, does the commission believe that concluding negotiations with Canada and Mexico, prior to commencing the reverse action, will give broadcasters, particularly in border regions, greater certainties and likely to increase the unwillingness to participate in this auction? Yes, or no?

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Wheeler, does the commission expect to conclude negotiations with Canada and Mexico prior to commencing the reverse action next year? Yes, or no?

WHEELER: The expectation is it is the goal.

DINGELL: You may not make it, is what you're saying.

WHEELER: It is -- it is the goal, and as we -- as I answered you in your previous point ... DINGELL: Would you notify -- would you notify this committee as soon as that becomes likely or dangerous?

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Now in this matter, Mr. Chairman, I'd like to state for the record that it's my understanding, based on exchange with counsel at the energy and commerce subcommittee on communications and technology, December 1, 2011, markup of the border of the act, that border negotiations are to be completed before the commission reassigns broadcast channels.

I hope that Chairman Wheeler will honor that understanding. I hope, Mr. Chairman, you understand I have great apprehensions about that, because of the impact it should have on the broadcast, and also on my constituents.

WHEELER: Mr. Chairman, this is -- I share your deep concern about this, not only because of the very legitimate concern you have about your constituents and other Americans getting service along the border, but also the candlevering (ph) effect, if you will, as it then -- as spectrum allocation then goes into the middle of the country.

I can assure you this is an incredibly high priority. I can also assure you that our Canadian colleagues have been very forthcoming and very helpful ...

DINGELL: I would like to have this submitted for the record in response to correspondence. Now, Mr. Chairman, I note that the commission proposes to use a method called quote, scoring, to set individual prices for each broadcast station participation -- or participating in the reverse auction. Is that correct?

WHEELER: It is one of the things we're considering ...

DINGELL: One ...

WHEELER: We have not made the final decision yet.

DINGELL: There are others?

WHEELER: There -- we're looking at others ...

DINGELL: I'm going to ask that you submit, in response to correspondence, a proper answer on that ...

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: ... particular point. Now, Chairman Wheeler, is the commission concerned that scoring, as opposed to competitive bidding, will decrease broadcasters willingness to participate in the reverse auction? Yes, or no?

WHEELER: No.

DINGELL: Now Chairman Wheeler, in general, do you intend to work in good faith with broadcasters as the commission defines the rules for reverse auction in order to situate (ph) that their needs are met, as the action (ph) specifies -- as the act specifies, to the best of your abilities? Yes, or no?

WHEELER: Absolutely.

DINGELL: I want to quote Admiral Rickrover (ph), who once observed, the devil's in the details, but so is salvation. I'm hoping you're going to see that the salvation is there and not just that we are going to find ourselves amidst trouble because of carelessness, not by you, but by some of your over-enthusiastic and less-than- competent predecessors. I thank you, Mr. Chairman. I yield my time.

WALDEN: The gentleman's time has expired, and has yielded back. The chair now recognizes the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Shimkus for five minutes.

SHIMKUS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and Chairman Wheeler, welcome. I'm going to try to get through three pretty quick points if I can. As you know, there's a lot of concerns on this side of the dials (ph) and this Title II debate ...

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

SHIMKUS: ... and -- and the basic premise is how do you -- for me, is how do you build out? You want -- we want more, not less. Does a regulated monopoly incentivize more build out, more pipelines, or does a competitive, capital-intensive, incentivized, market-driven process?

I believe the second. So that's -- we've gone from copper, to cable -- collective (ph) cable, satellite, cellular, fiber, a lot of different ways for data to now flow. And we want to encourage that.

And I don't -- I think only -- I kind of like the idea of incentivizing people who want to use more, making them pay more, to incentivize those who carry, someone may want to build out more. That's kind of where I come from. My position is more pipes, not less, more pipes not regulated pipe, competitive markets versus controlled markets.

So because here's an example of that -- a recent -- on May 16th, the Wireline Competition Bureau released a public notice seeking comment on state regulation of dial-up internet traffic. Dial-up. I mean that's a dinosaur. It's hardly used.

So there's -- there is no -- you want to talk about uncertainty for the state and for the providers, when we're still in this process, more than 15 years after the SEC first discussed the treatment of dial-up, we're -- we're now to this process? So that's just kind of a statement. That doesn't create certainty. Would you -- would you agree?

WHEELER: Well what we're trying to do, Mr. Shimkus, is to -- is to create an environment that assures consumers and those who rely on the internet that there is openness, while at the same point in time, encouraging investment.

SHIMKUS: Well let's just go back. I get that, but does that -- this is dial-up.

WHEELER: We still -- so if we're dealing with the dial-up -- I mean that's really -- that's a -- that's a different topic ...

SHIMKUS: Well it is, but it's not, because it's -- it's the whole debate about certainty, and if -- we actually have a dinosaur application, then why are we even ...

WHEELER: So we still have 40 percent of our consumers on dial-up telephone lines. One of the challenges that we have is how do we evolve that into an all IP environment, which would be, you know, an internet-like environment.

And one of the things that I have -- I have said to this committee is that we believe that this IP transition is a crucial part in how do we ...

SHIMKUS: OK, I get it, I'm going to try to (inaudible) ...

WHEELER: OK, sorry, sir.

SHIMKUS: In one deals in both of our sweet spot is kind of the public service, 9-11, the spectromac (ph) call for the creation of the do not call registry, and the automatic dialing issue. The commission keeps saying there's not enough money to do this.

I would ask you to check into that. I think there's a lot of money in the FCC. And because obviously this automatic dialing freezes up lines, and it's a public safety concern, and I would hope that we would work together to try to -- you would take that into consideration.

WHEELER: I would take a look forward to that. Let me -- let me get back, and I will come to ...

SHIMKUS: And you know, myself and the ranking member have been better (ph) involved in this issue, as you have in -- in the early days also. The last thing I want to -- from rural America, is kind of just there seems to be a de facto freeze on this shared service agreement.

And this isn't a broadcast sector, as you know. The local -- when you represent a third of the state of Illinois, as I do now, 33 counties, these shared agreements are now helping to provide, and we've got real-world cases, better local service to the local folks, than -- than less.

And I guess the basic question in my last minute is what's your plan to ensure that FDAC (ph) action on television transfer application is predictable, consistent, fair, and timely?

WHEELER: So -- thank you, Mr. Shimkus. What we -- what we have done, is to put out a public notice on how we look at transfers. And I consider this to be a procedural reform. Because the way it used to be, was broadcasters would -- would -- would come together in some kind of a -- a -- a merger situation, and they would come to the commission, which was a black box, that had constantly changing, well, this we'll look at it this way, we'll look at it that way.

And what I wanted to do was to say OK, what are the things that we will look at? So that everybody has notice, everybody understands, and it is not a black box. And that's the process that we have now established to be able to make those kinds of decisions.

SHIMKUS: Thank you. I know my time has expired. I appreciate it if you'd keep me in mind as these things move forward, it would be helpful.

WHEELER: Yes, sir. Thank you.

WALDEN: The chair now recognizes the gentlelady from Colorado, Ms. DeGette, for five minutes.

DEGETTE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I want to follow up, Chairman Wheeler, on this discussion about the open internet NPRM (ph). Leading up to the commission's vote last week, there was a robust public exchange among ISPs, and edge (ph) providers, and others, about the impact of paid prioritization on their business models. And as Ms. Matsui said, we've been hearing from a lot of our constituents about this as well.

Now you talked very briefly about -- a few minutes ago, about what the FCC is doing in its review process to look at the effect of paid prioritization on consumers' broadband bills. Wondering if you can comment about what you think the proposed open internet rules will have on access to new and innovative content online. Because that's one reason why we're concerned about these proposed rules.

WHEELER: The -- it should be encouragement of new and innovative programming, because of the fact that it assures that they will be able to reach the consumer, unfettered, and without having to pay special fees.

DEGETTE: And what impact do you think that the rules will have on average broadband speeds, network investments, and overall quality of service?

WHEELER: That's a terrific question ...

DEGETTE: Thank you.

WHEELER: ... I'm glad you asked it. You know, one of the fascinating things is that 2010, when the open internet rules were first proposed, since then, there has been hundreds of millions of dollars of broadband investment made. So the rules don't seem to have a chilling effect. And, speeds have been doing this, going up. And this is what the court was talking about when they talk about this virtuous cycle because everything -- in the internet ecosystem everything adds to everything else.

DEGETTE: So what do you think that the new rules, what effect will they have on these issues?

WHEELER: I believe ...

DEGETTE: You just talked about what's been happening...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: Yes, we believe that the rules that we have designed will continue to encourage investment in broadband, continue to encourage increases in throughput and as a result continue to encourage innovation from edge providers.

DEGETTE: And so are you saying also that average broadband speeds will increase?

WHEELER: Yes ma'am.

DEGETTE: And overall quality of service will increase?

WHEELER: Yes ma'am, they'll need to.

DEGETTE: All right. OK, one last thing no one has raised yet, is the issue of industry consolidation. And this year we've seen two major merger proposals in the telecom industry. Now clearly the industry's going through a period of significant technological and economic change. And some folks think that consolidation is the best approach to this. So all things being equal, do you think industry consolidation is good or bad for the consumers?

WHEELER: So, I read the other day that we are probably the -- in the last decade the biggest year for telecom mergers and what we're doing is opening a record on each of them. And we'll make that decision based on the record that is developed for each...

DEGETTE: ...So you don't have an opinion at this point?

WHEELER: I don't want to prejudge the record.

DEGETTE: OK. And as you know congress has recognized the importance and unique character of the telecommunications marketplace by giving the FCC the authority to review mergers under the public interest standard. Do you think the conditions the FCC placed on the Comcast/NBCU merger were effective at promoting the public interest?

WHEELER: Oh, wow, you know, that is something that -- a decision that my predecessor made. I know that it had impact. My goal is to look at the record that we have presented before me and my colleagues and make a decision on those.

DEGETTE: Do you think it promoted the public interest? Yes or no.

WHEELER: I think that there were multiple things in it that promoted the public interest.

DEGETTE: And what other lessons do you take away from commissions previous attempts to promote the public interests by placing conditions on mergers as you go forward?

WHEELER: That it is an important role that the commission has. You know, there is a lot of discussion as to why should there be any authority of the FCC to look at public interest obligations.

DEGETTE: Right.

WHEELER: I strongly believe that there is a big difference between the kind of statutory rigidity that the justice department is required to look at mergers with and the kind of broader public interest issues that you've raised that the statute asked the FCC to look at.

DEGETTE: Chairman, I just asked if you could supplement your testimony with some specific takeaways that this has given you. Thank you very much. Thanks Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: Gentlady yields back. The chair now recognizes -- I'm sorry the chair recognizes the Chairman.

(UNKNOWN): I just wanted to clarify one thing to make sure I heard it right. Did you say 40 percent of Americans are still using dial-up for internet access?

WHEELER: No, I'm talking about dial-up phone service writ large.

(UNKNOWN): OK because I was saying it's more like 3 percent.

WHEELER: No, dial-up phone service writ large.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you. And I thank the courtesy of the chair.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you for clarifying that, sir.

WALDEN: Thank you.

The chair now recognizes the gentleman from Nebraska for five minutes Mr. Terry.

TERRY: Thank you. It's good to know that my 82-year-old father is in the 3 percent, that makes him very elite. I'm trying to talk him out of that, but that's a...

(CROSSTALK).

WHEELER: I remember the days when we were thrilled to get 56kb, right?

TERRY: Yes.

So switching gears just a little bit. I wanna ask about quintile (ph) aggression analysis progress and I do think that you have probably captured its deficiencies better than anyone else has and I appreciate that work. I was glad to see the commission's follow-up by repealing the QRA formula.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

TERRY: So congratulations, I appreciate that. I'm curious on your thoughts of how it should be replaced and if you could walk me through what factors are going to be used in any decision making and time tables and process.

WHEELER: I respect the question, but I can't really answer it right now because we're in the process of -- there's several proposals and we're in the process of looking at what the best components of each are. And I don't want to hip shoot here, but we do have proceedings underway to say, OK, what is it we will replace QRA with?

TERRY: So, where are we within the process of those?

WHEELER: I think that we're probably heading into something that you would see before fall.

TERRY: Before fall?

(UNKNOWN): Early fall, football season.

TERRY: Well, I don't want to get distracted.

WHEELER: Well if you joined the big team.

TERRY: Do that when we McNeese State and I would appreciate that.

WHEELER: Yes sir.

TERRY: For the rest of you, that was humor. Now then let me go to a broadcast question since we succinctly dealt with one I thought would take all of five minutes. The spectrum deal that was authorized in incentive auctions and passed through the committee was a bipartisan bill and unfortunately the order removed the FCC was not bipartisan. And some commissioners, particularly republicans, stated that the order treats (ph) TV broadcasters that choose not to participate in the auctions unfairly and that has me concerned.

Congress set aside the 1.75 to reimburse broadcasters for us to move part of the incentive option in the range to fully recover their expenses. Why did the FCC not adopt the number as its repacking budget and ensure that broadcasters would not have to go out of pocket when forced to the FCC to move?

WHEELER: Thank you. Congress said a billion 750 million is the max that can be spent on repacking. We think that will be sufficient. There have been broadcasters who have expressed a concern that it might not be sufficient. So we have said, OK, we don't think that's going to happen, but we will put in place a process that will have a structure in place if and when that should happen. Sir, I don't expect that we're going to get there.

TERRY: All right. I'll just yield back my time. Thank you, sir.

WHEELER: The gentleman yields back and the chair now recognizes the gentleman from Utah, Mr. Matheson for five minutes. MATHESON: Thanks Mr. Chairman and Mr. Wheeler thanks for your testimony. I appreciate your candor and your articulate way you answer questions.

WHEELER: Thank you, sir.

MATHESON: I also want to commend you on your efforts to open up more spectrum for our license uses. The FCC took an important step last month by opening up the 100 gigahertz for spectrum for unlicensed uses in the 5 gigahertz band and I'm pleased to see in your testimony that the FCC is actively participating in an ongoing effort to free up additional unlicensed spectrum in the 5 gigahertz band. Can you provide an update on where things currently stand with resolving the technical issues in the ITS band currently used for vehicle-to-vehicle communications and the parts of the band used by the DOD for military radar?

WHEELER: Yes. So, as we talked, there's three slices to 5 gigahertz.

MATHESON: Right.

WHEELER: There's lower slice that we took care of. The middle, as you suggest, is DOD. We are having ongoing discussions with them. I have been personally involved in those discussions about a wide range of spectrum issues including this. There are strongly held beliefs on both sides, sir. I continue to believe, however, that people of good faith can find answers if you sit at the table long enough, and that's the goal.

And so far as the high band in 5 gig, yes, that's intelligent transportation, which offers such great opportunities with Google Smart Card and all this sort of thing. The thing that's really encouraging is that that's an 802 type of standard. It's not a dissimilar reality, however. Where we need to make sure that people are sitting around the table looking for commonalities rather than looking for differences.

MATHESON: Something we got to do around congress a little.

WHEELER: You have a little experience.

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: But that's the goal of what we're trying to do here.

MATHESON: Do you have a sense of what the -- do you have a timeframe for when this additional spectrum could be freed up?

WHEELER: I wish I did. I would be misleading you, sir, if I gave you a date right now.

MATHESON: I understand. Another issue I wanted to mention. The administrations ConnectED program, the goal to bring 100 megabit broadband to every school in the US. To the extent that this initiative is implemented through the ERAY (ph) program, what can the commission do to maximize efficiency and get the most bang for their buck?

WHEELER: Wow, thank you. Great question. There are multiple challenges in that. One is that we need to spend our money, the people's money, on 21st Century high-speed broadband solutions not 20th century solutions like dial-up telephone service and a long distance. Right now about half of the $2 billion, $2.4 billion that's being spent is spent for old stuff. Not today, half today (ph). Second part is that we have to design a system that helps schools and library administrators find their way through the maze that is telecom.

I mean, we put them in those jobs to educate students, not to be telecom wizzes. So we're trying to develop a process that says, you know, here's what you ought to be paying. Here's what somebody next door is paying. Here's like situated, so that they can go in and understand where they're bargaining positioning is.

We're going to be talking about being able to have longer contracts because buying it on a monthly basis, as we all know, is the worst way to buy. So let's talk about several years. We're going to be encouraging concertia (ph) so that you can buy in bulk and get better prices. And I just think that there are a myriad of things that we can do to get more efficiency out of the existing bucks, and we intend to do that.

MATHESON: That's great. Does the FCC plan on using the national broadband map to identify fiber that is already in place in a given community so it can be leveraged toward these ConnectED (ph) goal?

WHEELER: Absolutely and we have now taken over the ownership of the broadband map, so yes, sir.

MATHESON: OK, I appreciate that. I will yield back, Mr. Chairman.

WHEELER: Thank you very much. The gentleman yields back balance of time and the chair now recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. Lance for five minutes.

LANCE: Thank you very much and good afternoon to you. I believe that some of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle would prefer a title 2 reclassification. And if the commission were to decide to proceed in that direction, I'm concerned that it might trigger a lot of ill-fitting regulations that might not make sense in the context of these services. In your opinion, Chairman, would the process of going through forbearance to separate the wheat from the chaff, could it be a messy exercise and might it lead to more years of litigation and uncertainty is my real concern, sir?

WHEELER: Thank you, Congressman. That's one of the things that gets teed up in the imperium (ph) when we ask about title 2 versus section 706. And I presume that that will be exhaustively discussed in the responses. And that's exactly the kind of questions that we're asking.

LANCE: Thank you. One concern has been raised about the proposed net totality rule making process protections that would be afforded companies use a carrier that's providing the same service as another carrier. For example, the large carriers are beginning to bundle services that go well beyond phone service, the internet and television, to include smart phone services such as temperature control, home health monitoring, which of course is important to another subcommittee of this committee, as well as alarm services such as monitoring of home intrusions and fires, video surveillance or personal emerge response systems. What protections will the FCC provide to ensure that the carrier does not give its service provider a preference over a company using them as a broad-based carrier?

WHEELER: I'm not sure I exactly understand. What your concern is will there be preferences among providers of those services?

LANCE: Yes, Chairman.

WHEELER: That's contrary to the concept of an open internet.

LANCE: So, you can assure us as the American people that that will not be the case as these other services are provided moving forward?

WHEELER: Let me give you an example personally.

LANCE: Yes, sir.

WHEELER: I just switched out ADT in my home security system for another company. And I was able to access both of them over the internet and both of them over my mobile device and there should be no interference with my ability to move from ADT to the other provider.

LANCE: Thank you, and that's the goal of the commission and you will assure us that that is how you will proceed moving forward?

WHEELER: There needs to be open access for all providers.

LANCE: Thank you. I look forward to working with you. I understand you're a proud graduate of Ohio State, is that?

WHEELER: You bet, yes, sir.

LANCE: Please be gentle with Rutgers now that Rutgers has entered the big, whatever it is, the big 16 or whatever it is.

WHEELER: It's the big 10 that can't count.

LANCE: The big 10 that can't count. I defer back to the Chairman the balance of my time, a proud representative from Ohio.

WHEELER: Well thank you very much. For the gentlemen yielding back his balance of his time. The chair now recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. Butterfield for 5 minutes.

BUTTERFIELD: Thank you very much gentlemen for yielding time and thank you to you Chairman for your service and thank you for your testimony today. I especially thank you for your clarity. I told you that the first time that I met you and whenever I hear you speak it is unambiguous. At least until the subject of your home security system comes up and you are a little ambiguous with who the new provider is but thank you so very much.

Mr. Chairman in the communications act congress mandated that the commission ensured diverse participation in media and telecom and that includes participation in minority and women own businesses. The quote from the statue basically says that the mandate is to promote economic opportunity and competition by disseminating licenses among a wide variety of applicants including small businesses, rural telecoms and businesses owned by members of minority groups and women. End of quote.

It seems to me that the response of the commission to judicial criticism of the FCCs inaction in this area and the lack of meaningful study and progress as well as the low level of minority of women on participation and media and telecom licensing that the commission seems to me is not committed to these diversity goals. And if I am wrong about this, I would ask that you correct me.

On May the 14th, members of the congressional black caucus including Congressman Rush and myself addressed these concerns -- these diversity concerns in a letter to you. I suppose the letter may not have made its way to your desk yet, but I ask that you look at it very carefully when you do. Question, what precisely do you need beyond the congressional directions and judicial criticism to get the commission to make progress in creating opportunities for diverse communities.

WHEELER: Thank you, Congressman, and I got the letter this morning, so thank you. First of all, I agree that we have a mandate to have a broad swath of opportunity for all Americans to participate in all aspects of telecommunications. I can assure you that that's a goal of mine. Now let's talk about some specifics.

Number one, I think what we did on the JSAs in the broadcast space actually opens up opportunities for minority and small operators. That's why it was supported by more than a dozen representative minority groups. Secondly is, we are going to move on the AWS3 (ph) auction to make sure that there are appropriate steps taken to assure that minorities can participate through waivers in other kinds of processes in that auction. Thirdly, we are going to have -- and I should pause and in all of these call out Commissioner Clyburn, who has been the constant pusher on all of these issues.

There will be designated envy rules for the incentive auction that will create bidding credits for appropriate designated entities. And I very much take to heart both as an institutional responsibility and as a personal responsibility the language that you read.

BUTTERFIELD: And so when the spectrum is auctioned you are making a commitment that diversity will be an overriding concern of the commission?

WHEELER: What we want to do is make sure that there are opportunities for designated entities to get bidding credits to that, for instance, they can bid with 75 cent dollars against AT&T and Verizon's 100 cent dollars.

BUTTERFIELD: Let me get this last one in if I can. In light of the demographic changes of caring in our country and the growing numbers of mergers in the communications industry, how is the commission encouraging companies to partner with diverse businesses in the secondary market?

WHEELER: We have been doing that in both formally and informally, that there are great opportunities when there are transactions for minority companies. They, you know, grain telecom comes to mind, which is now operating spectrum I believe for both AT&T and Verizon, which they purchased as a part of some settlements with the commission. And those kind of opportunities are important and worthwhile. I also believe that there can be new opportunities in the broadcast space particularly after the auction in terms of being able to share spectrum and offer other kinds of services.

BUTTERFIELD: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WHEELER: Thank you very much. The chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Guthrie.

GUTHRIE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you for coming today. I know you had a busy week so your time is appreciated. My colleague from California Ms. Matsui have spent a lot of time on spectrum issues and we've founded a congressional spectrum caucus and -- and looking for different ideas on how we can move forward on that spectrum.

And I appreciate the efforts that you've done to move the incentive auction forward. And have a couple of questions about the guard bands and the 680 megahertz band. It appears to me that the band plan for spectrum cleared in the broadcast incentive auction carefully considered the importance of maximizing license spectrum and adhered to the technically reasonable standards set by congress for creating a duplex gap. And I applaud the commission for this area in this regard. Quick two questions, one how do you foresee going forward with unlicensed spectrum in the duplex gap? As you know it would be important for those who bid on adjacent license spectrum to have as sure there will not be interference and are you confident the FCC will have technical guidelines to have assurance for those who bid for license spectrum there will be no interference in the duplex gap from our lines (ph)?

WHEELER: Yes, sir. The answer to both you just identified technical standards. And so for instance we're going to have technical standards proceeding for wireless mics and others who would be using the unlicensed spectrums, so yes, sir.

GUTHRIE: OK, and we've been using social media to reach out to interest Americans and so we're here for representing the American people and one came from Kelly on Facebook and Kelly asked this question -- well Kelly submitted this question through Facebook who would like to ask the question about your plans for future spectrum policy and can you give Kelly a brief answer to her question about why just broadly future spectrum policy? WHEELER: Thank you Kelly. The answer is that, you know, they're not making it no more and so what we have to do -- I believe that we are today on the cusp of the new Verizon on spectrum policy with two things that we are doing. One is the incentive auction that you all created. Because when you boil everything down it ultimately comes to economics. And if you can address the other person's economics you can probably go along with solving your economics issue. And that's what the auction does.

The other component is spectrum sharing. And the days of hearing this is all yours who uses it are over and fortunately digital allows that kind of sharing. You know, think about going into a Starbucks and everybody is sharing that Wi-Fi spectrum. You put those two together and that's I think the answer to Kelly's question as to where is spectrum policy going. And we're in the middle of making both of those work right now, which is why what we're doing is so terribly important.

GUTHRIE: Yes, I often use the metaphor there's a very simple metaphor compared to a complex physics in this, but we don't have special highways for ambulances or fire trucks, we get out of the way when they need to go down the highway. So sharing that's kind of a simple way to look at the metaphor. There's in one of your statements and I'm putting my hate as a former state legislature so I was the Senator in Kentucky before here and there's been some concerns of places like Utah and Oregon where there's been municipal broadband deployed and the project have failed and there's (ph) were their competitive providers and these projects have resulted in putting millions of dollars in municipal bonds, property taxes, selling franchise taxes at risk and I believe the I probo (ph) sold to Google for a dollar and leaving city tax payers on the hook repaying tens of millions of dollars.

My understanding is five states or so have passed laws saying that cities can't do this -- because the states usually something happens to the city the states kind of on the hook for it as well and I believe in your prepared your written testimony you said that you believe the FCC could do perimption (ph) over this area in the state law and I just wanted you to clarify that. And why you think Washington could have a better view of this than Frankfurt, for example, in Kentucky.

WHEELER: So there are about 20 states that have put some kind of restrictions in place. And I see it through just exactly the opposite end of the telescope with all due respect, that if the citizens of a community want to organize through their local government to say to bring competition in broadband provision, they should not be inhibited.

GUTHRIE: No. They inhibit it by their elected...

WHEELER: They should not be inhibited by the fact that the incumbents have been urging the adoption of legislation that would ban it. And if we believe in competition, we ought to let competition flourished. So what I have said is that I'm following again Judge Silverman's comments in his dissent nonetheless in the open internet case in which he said, "If there's ever an example where 706 would apply, it is in the ability to -- to say the States, 'You cannot get in the middle of this virtuous cycle and prohibit consumers from being able to have access to a competitive service'".

GUTHRIE: So -- so your perception is that government should be doing that because of the incumbents or because they don't want to be on the hook for an I-provoke-type situation.

WHEELER: So the -- I go back to first principles with -- that is this is a decision that ought to be made by the people of the community. And that that if they want to take the risk, if they own it themselves, but you don't have to own it yourself.

It is also -- the gentleman from Utah has left. But for instance in Utah, there's a group of cities that have banded together to -- to solicit bids for somebody else to own that they would have a participation in.

That kind of structure -- if the people say that's what we want; this -- we want this kind of competition, then I think they ought to be encouraged together. And competition has clearly been shown to be the best tool.

GUTHRIE: Well, I don't disagree with you on that. But my time actually has expired. I know that Chairman's ready to gobble me down, so I yield back. Thank you.

WALDEN: Thank you very much. The -- the Chairman would never do that to the gentleman from Kentucky. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Vermont, Mr. Welch.

WELCH: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Wheeler, I have five questions. We have five minutes so we can go look at this split.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

WELCH: First thing, Bob Latta and I started the Rural Caucus. We so appreciated you coming an enormous concern in rural America that we get access to the internet. It's essential for our future. That neutrality is a big deal. That's the big topic. You've been getting comments.

There's an enormous amount of concern that if we make the wrong decision, the big guys are gonna get the fast lane, the little guys - many in rural America are gonna get the breakdown lane.

Can you give us some reassurance that at the end of this process, we're gonna have access, on equal terms, for folks in rural America to the internet?

WHEELER: You want a quick answer? Yes.

WELCH: Yes. WHEELER: Yes.

WELCH: And that's a full sentence. You can give a full sentence to reassure all of us especially rural America...

WHEELER: There should...

WELCH: That we're gonna be driving in the fast lane.

WHEELER: There should not -- there is one internet. There is not a fast internet; there is not a slow internet. There is not an urban internet; there is not a rural internet. There is one internet. Everybody ought to have open equal access to the capacity delivered by the internet.

WELCH: Okay. Thank you. Now, getting the internet, rural America is spread out, and the investors want to put their money where they can make the money. We all understand that. That was true for electricity. But we've got to get that internet out into rural America so we can be part of the modern economy.

And we have a Universal Service Fund with the -- with the Mobility Fund, whereas we need to have that. And I'm wondering if you could comment on the status of that and what we need to do to make sure that the funds are there to build out that broadband.

WHEELER: Specifically on the Mobility. Here's the interesting question that gets raised by Mobility. Broadband wireless is LTE. It is being built out across America. Recently just one of the major carriers announced a new initiative in rural America with LTE.

The question becomes, that we're wrestling with, is should we subsidize something if it's already happening? And that prudent fiscal responsibilities suggest probably not.

WELCH: Well, I got three more questions.

WHEELER: OK.

WELCH: So we wanna work with you on that to make it rational and not have us investing on things that aren't working but invest in things that are going to help rural America gets the best.

WHEELER: That's true. That's -- that's what we're trying to get to.

WELCH: All right. Third, we've got to work with you and your entire Commission, the Republicans and the Democrats. And when you came into our rural working group, you explained a couple of problems you had each in IT and also procedures where I guess it's easier to hire a lawyer...

WHEELER: Yeah.

WELCH: Than an engineer.

WHEELER: Yes.

WELCH: I'm a lawyer so maybe I'd like that, but I wouldn't be very much use to you. What are the things that this committee can advocate to help your entire Commission, Rs&Ds who want to do the job so you have the tools you need to do it?

WHEELER: Thank you for asking. Our IT infrastructure is worthy of this Masonian. I came from a business background. The things that you cannot do is -- that are common sense in the business world. The fact that we're still using computers that have known cyber risks associated with them. The fact that we can't organize a consumer complaint process online for American consumers because our IT system isn't up to us -- up to it is ridiculous.

So, we have serious problems there on the issue of lawyers versus engineers. Far be it for me to take a side on that but we do need more engineers, sir.

WELCH: OK. Thank you.

WHEELER: And economists.

WELCH: Right.

WHEELER: And economists.

WELCH: Well, I'd like our committee to work with you on that. Next, Section 706. There's a lot of concern about whether you have the sufficient authority under that section in order to give you the rulemaking power to guarantee the outcome being net neutrality. Can you comment on that? Do you still feel that that is sufficient and the court gave you a roadmap forward?

WHEELER: I think -- I think that we do have sufficient authority and then when the court talked about this virtuous cycle and they said, "Anything that interferers with that virtuous cycle is a violation of 706", that that is a very broad grant of authority.

WELCH: OK. My last question in 26 seconds. Retrans consent and blocking online content, we've seen that in the broadcast area where there's a dispute and people can't get access to the signal. Now, that's starting to migrate into the online content. Is this the beginning of the cabalization of the internet?

WHEELER: Sir, I think it is the right question. Our authority goes to the -- retransmission and program access goes to the authority of good faith negotiations. I think there is reason to be concerned when because I happen to subscribe to an ISP who is in a dispute with a program provider. That the program provider blocks all access from all IP addresses coming from that ISP. I think that is something that is -- is -- is of concern and that we all should worry about.

WELCH: Okay. I yield back. Thank you very much, Mr. Wheeler.

WHEELER: Thank you, sir.

WALDEN: Thank you very much. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. Pompeo.

POMPEO: Thank you, Mr. WALDEN: Thank you for being here today. I don't want to spend a lot of time on net neutrality. We have different view. I view it is nothing more than a price control. I think we've seen how that works in creating supply. And so I think -- I think it's a very dangerous path that you're headed down.

I do want to ask a couple of process questions related to that. Have you spoken to anyone at the White House or OMB in the last month regarding net neutrality?

WHEELER: Only to keep them appraised. They have been assiduous in their recognition that we are an independent agency.

POMPEO: And did you call them or did they call you?

WHEELER: I called them.

POMPEO: And has anyone else on your staff spoken to folks at the White House or OMB in the last month?

WHEELER: Not in my...

POMPEO: With this issue?

WHEELER: Well, on -- the answer is I'm sure. On -- on this issue, I don't know but I can assure you from my discussions with everybody, from the President on down, the recognition of the independence of our agency; and I'll go further and assure you that never have I or to my knowledge anyone of my staff felt any pressure to decide any issue.

POMPEO: I appreciate that. Thank you. I want to follow-up on something. Representative Guthrie was saying you believe the FCC has the power to preempt state law to ban competition from community broadband.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

POMPEO: Under Section 706.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

POMPEO: Do you believe that State have the same authority.

WHEELER: I think that's the -- the issue that I believe is do we have the authority to preempt. That raises the question of what is the authority of the State. And I think that we have preempt authority. I think we'll probably end up having this answered in court.

POMPEO: Wait, look. I -- I just read the statute that they have the same authority that the -- the FCC does. The language is identical. It says you would have authority as you have in that.

WHEELER: Well, it says State Commissions. POMPEO: Right.

WHEELER: If you will. Yes. And -- and it says that we have -- we have preemptory authority over State Commissions.

POMPEO: So State Commissions have the same authority that you do. Do you agree with that?

WHEELER: Don't I?

POMPEO: That's a simple statute, I mean it says the same thing I just said.

WHEELER: No I think that I -- I think that it says that that -- that both of us have authority, but that we have preemptory authority on this issue. And I think that's what Judge Silverman was saying in his dissent in that Verizon...

POMPEO: Great. Not all dissent. Chairman, will the FCC's Media Bureau recently issued new, they call them "Processing Guidelines for Broadcast Transactions"; and this broadcast talks not only about future broadcast transactions but also pending applications. I have three questions with respect to that.

First, how many applications have been singled out for a closed scrutiny since that new guidelines have been issued? How many have been approved in those two months? And when might those broadcasters see the resolution of their applications?

WHEELER: I don't know the answer to any of -- of those three for the -- off top of my head. But I'll be happy to get it for -- get it for you for the record.

POMPEO: OK. You can understand these are pending applications submitted under the set of rules. You've now moved the goalpost on them. This is -- this is...

WHEELER: No, actually, I -- yes, sir, I understand your point. What we're trying to do is not move the goalpost but to open up the process so that everybody knows...

POMPEO: But that's what you did.

WHEELER: ...what the rules are.

POMPEO: But that's what you did. I mean you changed -- you changed the rules with respect to applications already submitted under preexisting set of standards. So, and I don't know how you could describe that as anything but moving the goalpost.

WHEELER: With all respect, sir. We had -- we had a series of transactions that were in placed. And in the decisions on those transactions, we said, note, "Going forward, there will be a new look at what financial structures are in transactions", not in these transactions that we're approving. Then we put out a public notice that said, "Here is how we are going to open up this black box and here is what is gonna be going on." And it is that standard. So there was -- there was notice as a part of a decision that was not affected. Then there was notice through a public notice. And now those that they -- the Bureau is reviewing are subject to both of those.

POMPEO: And my last 20 seconds. And with net neutrality, there are also cyber security issues. Do you plan to explicitly give network providers liability protections in their efforts to protect their network from cyber security as part of your rulemaking and --for net neutrality.

WHEELER: It was not considered as a part of the rulemaking to have -- have that.

POMPEO: All right. Mr. Chairman, I yield back my time.

WALDEN: Thank you very much. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Mexico, Mr. Lujan.

LUJAN: Mr. Chairman, thank you very much. Chairman, we thank you so much...

WHEELER: Mr. Lujan.

LUJAN: ...for being here as well. Chairman Wheeler, two weeks ago, this committee added my amendment calling on the FCC to conduct a study on reforming the designated market area system to the STELA Reauthorization Bill.

As you know, DMAs are currently defined by a map drawn by Nielsen, a for-profit marketing research company based upon the reach of television broadcast antennas. This kind of work of antennas is based upon technology deployed back in the '40s and '50s. Americans could have a multitude of viewing options via technology such as cable, broadband and wireless internet. But current DMA rules prevent the viewership of much of that content.

I believe that a system embraced by these technologies could revitalize television broadcasting with new affiliates reaching viewers who have more in common than their placement on Nielsen's old map.

It is my hope that the Commission takes this study seriously and bring the policy into the 21st century, Mr. Chairman. So I hope that we might be able to work...

WHEELER: Thank you for your leadership on this, Mr. Lujan. And that I assure you that we will take it seriously.

LUJAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And Mr. Chairman, it wasn't too long ago that a company would not allow access to another companies upside. There was a question a few years ago with AT&T and FaceTime, an Apple product.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

LUJAN: As I talked about fixed versus mobile. They defended it by saying it was allowed under the FCC's net neutrality rules granted this was under 3G.

Section 62 of the proposal suggests no -- no blocking rule -- that sorry, the no blocking rule was applied to different standard to mobile broadband internet access and mobile internet access service was excluded from the unreasonable discrimination rules. We're seeing mobile getting fast -- faster now and with the new spectrum options, even faster than fixed.

I appreciate and I agree with you that we're talking about one internet with open and equal access. With my colleagues in rural areas, I shared with you before that there's a conversation about taking phone calls and with bandwidth capabilities as well as streaming of content on airplanes. In rural America, we should be able to get the same treatment. I do not understand why we're not there yet. But nonetheless, it's common.

So I'm hopeful that as we have this conversation that we're able to have equitable treatment. I know that there is a, as I read in the proposal, that there is elements of asking for a look into this...

WHEELER: Right.

LUJAN: ... in the rule. But I'm certainly hopeful that this will be treated with the same scrutiny and level of attention. And again, as I talk about an old antiquated rule within the '40s and '50s, we talked about dial-up, that this is another area that we're going to have equitable treatment as well especially with new gigabit access as well.

Mr. Chairman, in another area, I know that there's a number of my colleagues who join me in their concern for recent reports of interconnection deals particularly the one between Comcast and Netflix. You stated that peering is not a net neutrality issue, there is a matter of the -- that there is a matter of the open internet and there is a matter of the internet connection among the various disparate pathways that become the internet.

Well, I understand that net neutrality refers only to the behavior of internet service providers blocking or throttling the speeds of certain websites. My question is how is an interconnection agreement that essentially throttles content substantially different?

WHEELER: So, thank you. So that's -- that's a very good question. They -- you can -- you can think of the internet in -- in three parts. There is the -- well, actually four parts. There is somebody like Netflix getting on the internet and then writing so- called middle mile providers to a peering point which is just a fancy word for interconnection where they then have access to Comcast Verizon, whoever the case maybe.

The consumer buys from their computer up to the peering point. Traditionally, peering has been I'll take mine, you take yours, back and forth kind of a thing; and -- and -- and for free. That has begun to change overtime.

LUJAN: If I may apologize, my time has been elapsed, so maybe what I'll do is if we could get that into the record. All that I would add is once upon a time peering agreements didn't have an exchange of money. People find a way to...

WHEELER: Exactly right.

LUJAN: ...each other. And I'm hoping that we can get some certainty with the treatment of fixed versus mobile in that area. And lastly, I -- I'd like for the record if there's any way that you might be able to provide us more specifics and details with what's been talked about as commercially reasonable...

WHEELER: Good.

LUJAN: ...as well as we talk about now pretty smaller companies have disadvantages. I apologize again, Mr. Chairman. I could always sit and visit with you. And the last thing that I would say is President Obama isn't in support of an open internet and I would encourage you to speak with him. So thank you very much for that as well.

WHEELER: Let me just -- Congressman, so am I.

WALDEN: Thank you. Thank you very much. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. Scalise.

SCALISE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman for having the hearing and thank you Commissioner Wheeler for being here today and answering our questions. And there was -- as we look at the potential changes that have been proposed, a lot of us that want to continue to maintain a free and open internet want to make sure that we're going about it the right way. I know you've got some concerns with the fact that the FCC would even consider going to Title II route in terms of reclassifying broadband, you know.

And a lot of us had reached out for our constituents to -- to have them also give us suggestions on things that they would like to ask you as well. And a lot of the -- the comments that we got I know that I got in my district were just concerns about maintaining that open internet, and keeping the government out of regulating it, and -- and trying to make sure that the government doesn't impede the ability for the innovations that we've seen which have been so dramatic and revolutionized to not only the country, but revolutionized the entire world. And it's a lot of innovation that -- that's made in America. And we want to continue to see that innovation thrive.

When you -- when you look at going into the reclassification, and there's a proposal that's out there. I know, like I said, I've got concerns about that. But in your written statement, you assert that the private sector must play the leading role in extending broadband networks to every American. That if it were to be reclassified under Title II, who -- who would pay for extending those networks if they're subject to common carrier regulations.

WHEELER: Private sector.

SCALISE: But then when you look at the -- the Title II route, would the FCC have the authority to regulate broadband pricing?

WHEELER: So in the vastness of Title II, that is conceivable. One of the reasons that we are asking for Title II versus Section 706 comments in this proceeding is to be able to specifically zero-in on what are issues such as that. What are the...

SCALISE: So you think you may have the ability to regulate broadband pricing, is that something you -- you think could be an open...

WHEELER: Now, let's...

SCALISE: ...possibility for the FCC?

WHEELER: Should a full Title II regime be chosen, which should has not been, we are proposing...

SCALISE: But you're making the proposals.

WHEELER: ...Section 706.

SCALISE: Right.

WHEELER: No, we're -- we're -- no we're not. What we're doing is we're proposing Section 706 as the approach and then we've asked questions about Title II. And these are the kinds of issues that come up -- will come up in that discussion and that are gonna warrant...

SCALISE: But if -- if you'd in them telecommunication services. You know, because that puts broadband into a different realm than it is today. It's not there right now. If you do choose to try to put it there. Which state public utility in the -- in our State. We've got a public service commission. Would those state public service commissions and other related entities in the States be able to -- to regulate broadband at that point?

WHEELER: So what we have proposed is not Title II, it's Section 706. What we have asked is for a discussion of Title II and those kinds of issues. But our proposal for which I've taken a lot of heat is not Title II. I've said...

SCALISE: We don't have to go forward with the proposal.

WHEELER: I've said -- I've said...

SCALISE: So you stop taking the heat right now and...

WHEELER: No, I've said -- I've said that we're -- I said that Title II was on the table. That we're willing to look at Title II. But -- and -- and Mr. Waxman has a specific proposal where he thinks that Title II ought to be a backup and that's a proposal that is important and worth considering. But the proposal that we made is Section 706. SCALISE: Let me ask you this because you're also -- it seems like a one-way street where you're just targeting this towards internet service providers. I mean there are a lot of content carriers out there too, content providers that, you know, a lot of members have used the Netflix example or, you know, Google and other content providers that also have a play in this realm that that you just seem to be targeting this towards internet service providers.

And so I'm not sure if there's some -- some acts to grind there, but it just seems like it's a -- it's a one-sided approach that you're taking even in the review. And I -- I wouldn't -- wouldn't recommend going down that road for any of these folks. But I just wanted to point that out.

And one last thing coz I know I'm running out of time. In the February report, the FCC, some of your staff in the working group, recommended eliminating some of the reports that are out there, the Orbit report, the International Broadband report, and Modifying Video Competition report and Cable Price and Service, some of those things.

I've got a piece of legislation we've passed out of the Full House twice now, very bipartisan figures unanimous earlier in this Congress called the FCC Consolidated Reporting Act, which really tries to -- to take a -- a broad view and into eliminate a lot of the outdated reports, the streamline reporting process, something that I think you've seen bipartisan's report to do in the House.

We're trying to get the Senate to take that up. I'm not sure if you've got a comment on what you think should happen there, if that's something you're supportive of generally, especially as it relates to -- to the Bipartisan Bill in the House trying to move through the Senate to also would become law to streamline the process as your staff is suggesting some of these areas.

WHEELER: So -- so, you know, in the Senate side, it's Senator Heller who has been...

SCALISE: Yeah.

WHEELER: ...pushing on this. And I know that he and Senator Rockefeller are talking about it in terms of their package of legislation over there. I definitely agree that -- that there are -- there is a plethora of reports and that we are spending a lot of time that could be better organized, shall we say.

SCALISE: Including competitiveness in the telegraph industry which is still on the books, which we're trying to get rid off in this bill over there. I appreciate that and anything you can do to help us advocate for the advancement. I do think that's one area where we found a lot of bipartisans support in the way it passed the House. Hopefully we can get the Heller bill move through the Senate as well on the -- and get that to the present statute.

WHEELER: Thank you, gentleman.

SCALISE: Thank you very much for your time. And I yield back as well my time.

WALDEN: Thank you very much, Mr. Scalise. I do not see any member in the Democratic side. Mr. Kinzinger of Illinois is recognized.

KINZINGER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And thank you for being here today with us. I know it's a lot of...

WHEELER: Thank you for your patience, Mr. Kinzinger.

KINZINGER: Yeah, you're welcome. I might be the end. Wow. So -- but we had a lot of big issues we want to talk about. I'm just going to hit a couple right now. I'd like to talk to you a little -- I know it was -- it was touched earlier about the E-Rate Program.

I'm a big supporter of the intentions of this program and especially it's modernization. And I appreciate the Commission putting on the recent workshop on this issue. I have a few concerns I want to address.

I represent a rural district with a number of very small schools and libraries. And over the past few months, I've reached out to a lot of these entities and asked them what their concern is and -- and asked them about their participation or their lack of participation in the program to see what concern -- concerns or issues they have with the program itself.

The number one problem raised in these conversations was the complexity involved in both applying for and eventually receiving the funding necessary to move forward in implementing new technology in their facilities through the E-Rate Program.

In hearing this, I actually looked into the issue a little further and found out that the basic application for funding, and this is the process of it, but the basic application is 17 pages long. And with additional technologies not being necessary can run even longer, i.e. Wi-Fi. I would actually probably rather punch myself in the face and be the guy that has to fill this out.

So the complexity of the -- of the application process has actually caused a number of these schools to spend money on outside consultants to help guide them through this process. And this is money that's no longer being spend on our students and automatically puts many smaller rural schools at a disadvantage coz they don't have the funds necessary to pay this out so I can sell them. Essentially, we leave individuals in a technological desert if you will.

As the Commissioner continues these efforts to modernize the E- Rate Program, what are your plans to simplify the application process for these small and rural districts. And also, will you commit to working to address the issues faced by these schools who have routinely told me they simply cannot afford to pursue these funds.

WHEELER: Congressman, I share your shock and dismay. We're gonna fix it.

KINZINGER: Good. All right. Do you have an idea of a timeframe? How long?

WHEELER: Yeah, we're gonna...

KINZINGER: We're busy. We're going home.

WHEELER: It's gonna be part of our -- of our E-Rate modernization program that we'll be bringing forward. There's actually a series of things that we're gonna begin administratively even before that -- that rulemaking takes place. It is -- yes, sir. I mean I...

KINZINGER: All right.

WHEELER: I'm as -- you know, how do we get online. So it becomes an interesting challenge. So here we are talking about broadband access for schools and libraries and we have a 17-page paper process.

KINZINGER: Right.

WHEELER: So unfortunately, it's not something that you can solve just like this because as I've indicated like to Mr. Welch, we have awful IT systems. But what I would like to get to is for your schools and all schools and libraries to be able to get online to make their filling, to be able to track that filling and where things stand, and to do it less frequently than annually.

KINZINGER: Right.

WHEELER: Well, I appreciate that. I want to touch on one other quick issue in this short amount of time. Again, thank you for your consideration with the -- the E-Rate issue.

I'm concerned with the process and policy rationale used to changed the FCC's treatment of broadcast JSAs for the purpose of the broadcast ownership rules. The decision to count TV JSAs' ownership has the effect of tightening ownership restrictions without the comprehensive review of the ownership rules that is required by statute. And your analysis seem to lack an appreciation for the public interest benefited -- benefits fostered by JSAs.

In Rockford, for instance, an area I represent, without these agreements, the Fox station produces actually a Hispanic newscast and they've said that they will not be able to produce that Hispanic newscast, for instance. Well, I don't believe my local TV station should have to fight for a waiver and we can have a broader issue on the whole discussion in general.

I do wanna say in light of your rule, are you gonna make sure that these stations can take advantage of waivers and will there be clear transparent standards for applying for waivers in this process.

WHEELER: Thank you, Congressman because you've raised a really important point about waivers.

The reality was why we had to deal with JSAs is there was becoming a cottage industry in this town, down on K Street of lawyers figuring out creative ways to get around the ownership rules of the Commission's head in place forever. And JSAs were a favorite way of doing that.

What we have said is that you have to have attributable ownership as you've indicated. But that there is a waiver process to address exactly what you're talking about in Rockford. And yes it's an expedited process, and it is a -- it's a -- it's a situation unfortunately where -- where the process took over and perverted the underlying rules and the basic concepts of ownership.

KINZINGER: We can -- and -- and we can have that broader discussion when I have more time. My time is expired but I will say I've heard a lot of concerns from local TV stations even on my district. And I hope that, you know, while we disagree with the rule, I hope that you make it very clear how they can apply for these waivers and how they can get this thing carry them. Mr. Chairman, I yield back and thank you.

WHEELER: Yes, thank you.

WALDEN: Thank you very much. In behalf of Mr. Matheson and of myself, thank you Chairman Wheeler for your testimony this morning. We look forward to working with you in the future. And the hearing is now adjourned.

LUJAN STATEMENT ON REPORTS OF MISMANAGEMENT AT VA MEDICAL CENTERS

BYLINE: States News Service

LENGTH: 213 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

The following information was released by the office of New Mexico Rep. Ben R. Lujan:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District released the following statement today on reports of mismanagement at Department of Veterans Affairs medical centers. Lujan recently sent a letter to Secretary Shinseki expressing concerns with these reports and excessive wait times for veterans in New Mexico seeking health care services from the VA. Click here for the letter.

"When we as a nation ask brave Americans to serve and protect our county, we make a promise that when they answer the call of duty we will provide them with the care they have earned. The deeply disturbing reports of mismanagement at VA medical clinics strike at the very heart of our commitment to our men and women in uniform and the veterans who have sacrificed so much. It breaks a solemn promise to our veterans and shakes the faith of the American people that our veterans will be treated like the heroes they are.

"The administration and VA must act swiftly to restore that faith by thoroughly investigating and getting to the bottom of any failure to care for our veterans, addressing the backlogs, and taking steps to implement real reforms that will ensure this mismanagement does not occur again."

CHC Members on President Obama's Designation of the Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks National Monument

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 623 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. (3rd CD), issued the following news release:

Members of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus today released the following statements in response to President Obama's announcement that he will use his authority under the 1906 Antiquities Act to establish the Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks National Monument. The monument, located in Las Cruces, New Mexico, will help tell the story of Latinos in American history and protect unique natural resources for the nation's benefit.

The designation is expected to promote economic growth in the local community through tourism and outdoor recreation.

Rep. Raul M. Grijalva of Arizona, the ranking member of the House Subcommittee on Public Lands and Environmental Regulation, congratulated President Obama on the announcement and highlighted its importance for everyone interested in Hispanic American history.

"The Organ Mountains tell the story of centuries of conflict, boundary disputes and reconciliations with Mexico," Grijalva said. "Many Latino families in the Southwest trace their roots to the region, and its natural beauty continues to draw people today. Designating this sensitive area as a national monument means the Organ Mountains will inspire and be enjoyed by generations of Americans to come, and I couldn't be happier to support President Obama's decision."

"New Mexico is blessed with majestic lands and the Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks are a tremendous example of the beauty of our great state," said Rep. Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico. "The people of New Mexico have a special connection with these precious lands and the monument designation will ensure that not only the land but our culture and way of life will be protected for years to come. Thanks to the efforts of so many stakeholders in southern New Mexico who have worked hard to advocate for this designation, the Organ Mountains will attract more visitors, provide a boost to tourism, and strengthen the local economy."

"I am very pleased with the designation of the Organ Mountains-Desert Peaks as a national monument. This national treasure is not only central in preserving the region's biodiversity, but it is also key in protecting New Mexico's rich history and diverse culture for future generations," said Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham of New Mexico. "Preserving this land will protect New Mexico's tourism and outdoor economy, while also spurring economic development and job growth in the state. This new monument is an investment in New Mexico's communities and future generations."

According to a 2013 economic study (http://www.nmgreenchamber.com/OMDPjobs) by BBC Research & Consulting, protecting the Organ Mountains would generate $7.4 million in new economic activity annually and double the number of jobs supported by outdoor recreation and tourism in the area. Furthermore, a 2006 study by the National Parks and Conservation Association revealed each federal dollar invested in national parks generates at least four dollars of economic value to the public.

President Obama has previously designated monuments honoring the contributions of Latinos to American society using the Antiquities Act. This includes the Cesar E. Chavez National Monument in California, Chavez' home and the headquarters of the United Farm Workers of America since the early 1970s when Chavez was its president.

Raul M. Grijalva, who also serves as a co-chair of the National Landscape Conservation System Caucus, sent a letter to President Obama (http://grijalva.house.gov/uploads/Thank%20you%20Letter%20to%20White%20House%20on%20Monument%20Designation.PDF) thanking him for the significant contribution to the National Conservation Lands.

New Mexico Dems: Congressman Ben Ray Lujan Highlights USDA Funding Aimed at Fighting Poverty in Rural New Mexico

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 245 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District highlighted funding from the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) today through the StrikeForce initiative that provides assistance to farmers, ranchers, and private forest owners in rural areas. The USDA is providing $15 million in 20 states, including $450,000 for New Mexico, which targets rural communities that experience "persistent poverty."

"Sadly, too many people in New Mexico are living in poverty and struggling to get by. With the economy continuing to feel the effects of the deep recession, rural communities have been hard hit," Congressman Lujan said. "This program can help rural farmers and ranchers by providing critical funding for conservation efforts that enable them to improve their land that is so important to their economic wellbeing."

Through the Natural Resources Conservation Service, the USDA will provide technical and financial assistance in the StrikeForce areas, building on efforts that have invested a total of $653 million for conservation efforts since 2010. Funds, which are provided through the USDA Environmental Quality Incentives Program, can be used for conservation activities, including water conservation improvements and soil protections. Applications for funding are accepted at local USDA Service Centers.

TEXT:

WALDEN: We'll call to order the Subcommittee on Communications and Technology and certainly want to welcome our members and our witness, the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission. Mr. Wheeler, we're delighted that you would make time to come and spend with us on this important day, with so much going on in the telecommunications world.

Six months ago this subcommittee met for the very first time with the current complement of FCC commissioners, and welcomed Mr. Wheeler as the new chairman. Today, and let me welcome Mr. Wheeler back, we meet to review the record of action and selective inaction that the commission has taken under the first six months of your leadership. Unfortunately, given some of the most recent actions out of the commission, I fear that we may be heading into some rough waters.

When we last met, I offered two pieces of advice to Chairman Wheeler, and his colleagues. First, I urged them to heed the words of Congress, where it was - has spoken and reject calls to act in ways contrary to Congressional intent. Second, I urged them to bear in mind that even seemingly small changes in the Federal Communications Commission rules can have significant impact on the marketplace. I called upon all the members of the commission to discharge their duties with transparency, accountability and a long view of the technological landscape. In sum, my advice was that they must approach their duties with humility and restraint.

Unfortunately, recent actions have hinted that my advice was ignored. In December, we had yet to know that the DC Circuit Court of Appeals would once again reject the commission's attempt to regulate the Internet and could only speculate as to whether the commission under Chairman Wheeler's lead would mount a third attempt. Sadly, we now know the answer. Not only is Chairman Wheeler leading us down this path again, the item the commission adopted last week tees up the long dead idea that the Internet is a common carrier.

This reinvigorated willingness to consider regulating the Internet under Title II of the Communications Act, rules that find their roots in the 19th century railroad regulation, and were designed to regulate the world of telephone monopoly, harking back to a world in which twisted copper was the only portal for consumers, the communications network and voice the only service. The modern communications landscape bears no resemblance to the world Title II was meant to regulate, and application of Title II to the Internet is, at best, a poor fit. Worse still, the practical consequences of reclassification are to give the bureaucrats at the FCC the authority to second guess business decisions and to regulate ever possible aspect of the Internet.

We should all pause and consider the prospect of the FCC as a rate setting authority over Internet access and what that means for innovation in the telephone network of yesteryear. We should also be aware that this path opens a door for states to regulate the Internet. Contrary to any intended effect, the reclassification of broadband service under Title II will harm consumers, halt job creation, curtail innovation and stifle investment.

In sum, at a time when the commission at Congress' direction is taking steps toward even greater growth and innovation across Internet access platforms, the commission is simultaneously contemplating rules that undermine those very efforts and compromise the fundamental approaches of both the Clinton and Bush Administrations that laid the foundation for the Internet that we know today.

It's troubling that some of the actions taken under Chairman Wheeler's watch, the selective inaction of the FCC is equally troubling. Although required under the Telecommunications Act, the Federal Communications Commission has failed to complete its quadrennial review of the limitations on ownership of broadcast properties. It's been six years, six years, since the commission last fulfilled this statutory mandate. Rather than focus on ensuring that the rules reflect reality, however, the chairman has now announced that the commission would essentially scrap the 2010 quadrennial review and begin in earnest its 2014 quadrennial review.

Now, notwithstanding this stale record, the FCC also moved forward to make major changes to the regulations that govern media ownership anyway. It adopted changes to its attribution rules that determine how to count stations toward the local television ownership rule, the FCC also stated that it would begin counting certain shared service agreements toward the local ownership cap. In order to comply with local ownership rules, these pronouncements will likely force broadcasters to divest stations and unwind shared service agreements that are beneficial to ensuring local content in the smaller markets. These changes do not bring benefits to the communities served by these broadcasters, drawing into question how this change could serve the public interest.

Finally, FCC process reform has been an ongoing priority of our subcommittee. It's an issue my colleagues and I are deeply invested in, as demonstrated by the unanimous passage in the House of the bipartisan Federal Communications Commission Process Reform Act on March 11th of this year. Unfortunately, after the events of the past few months I'm sad to say I continue to be troubled by the FCC's seemingly flawed process.

In March the FCC chose to restrict license transfers involving certain shared service agreements which had long been blessed - implicitly blessed by the commission. This action was not debated by the commissioners, nor was it subject to any kind of vote. Rather, it was announced by the chief of the media bureau as a fait accompli.

Recent press reports also allege the chairman's office withheld presentation of revisions to the Open Internet Notice of Proposed Rulemaking from Republicans for as long as 24 hours, after having provided the material to the Democratic commissioners and to the press during the run up to the May 15th FCC Open Meeting. The concern raised by these reports is only compounded by revelations that a substantially revised draft of another item scheduled for vote at the open meeting was not presented to other offices until the closing minutes of the evening before.

According to Commissioner Pai's dissent from the commission's mobile spectrum holdings item, his office received the revised item fewer than 12 hours before the open meeting and the item contained more than 3,000 revisions. So, I find myself channeling Commissioner Rosenworcel, who said of the Open Internet NPRM, that the quote, "Process that got us this rule making today is flawed." Closed quote. Committee has opined in the past that withholding of a revised draft item from other members of the commission until the 11th hour precludes the scrutiny and analysis necessary for ease in decision making. It's my hope that these occurrences were anomalies. Perhaps Chairman Wheeler will want to commit today to providing his fellow commissioners with adequate and equal time to review proposed orders and rules.

The transformative impact of the evolution of technology from a long - analog to digital, from narrow band to broadband, has forever altered our lives. The evolution continues and the commission has before it the issues I just mentioned and many more, all significant in their impacts on our lives and the economy. Stated in your written testimony, you're eager to build on the progress of the last six months going forward, and I hope working together we can move forward in a direction that protects the success, this critical sector of the economy has enjoyed and facilitates its continued growth and job creation unencumbered by over regulatory overreach.

With that, I yield back, and I recognize my friend and colleague from California, Miss Eshoo, the Ranking Member of the subcommittee for her opening statement.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and good morning to all of my colleagues and welcome back to the committee, Chairman Wheeler. Before we do a - a deep dive into the specifics of the chairman's proposal as well as so many other major issues that are before the FCC, I - I think that it would be well for us to step back and appreciate what I believe is one of the most consequential inventions in human history. This was dreamed of and built by disruptors. It's an American story, it's a product of American genius, the Internet. One word, but it is - it really it takes one's breath away in terms of the arc of history.

It's not only an invention, it has reshaped lives, economies here and around the world, and our thinking and our debate today really should be viewed, I think, through the prism of a critical step that we're taking now in the 21st Century. The Internet is a continuum of change. It's accessible. It's open. And its innovations continue. They empower individuals, entire fields of learning, growing not only our economy but economies around the world, and serving humanity in countless ways. All of this has taken place and here we are, in the second decade of the 21st Century.

So, this is huge. This is huge. This is not what is behind door number one, door number two, door number three, where the price is right. This is not some guessing game. This is huge. This is something, these decisions are going to affect every single American going forward, just as it has in the past and it will continue to. So, all of us, regulators, innovators, consumers, legislators, we have to get this right. The stakes are very high and American cannot lose. It's been our leadership that has advanced the digital age. And, now is not the time and, actually, I don't think there should be ever a time to unravel the values that have really been the hallmarks and the bulwarks of the Internet.

So, the question is: how do we seize the future? At least in my view that's what the question is. I know what I want to see continue: openness, free, accessible, these are also the hallmarks of our democracy. And that's what this has been such an extraordinary export of - of our country.

I know what I don't want. I don't want this to become an auction, selling off the best in bits and pieces, where some pay for faster lanes. Others can't pay, they get stuck in the slow lane. Some giant company blocking content and others discriminating so that they can sell their stuff to keep the other guy's stuff stymied. That's not a very pretty description, but it's a street description of what can be at hand.

I want every day to be essentially the Fourth of July for American innovation. So, that it just keeps bursting. It just keeps bursting. And I see it every day in my Congressional district. Looking forward 10 years. 25 years, 50 years, I want this to continue and we should all be thinking on a grand scale, because this growth and this economic driver should be for everyone. We need smart, savvy regulations - regulatory decision, we need a Congress that's engaged in this, and a Congress that's vigilant, and I plan to be.

So, what should the FCC do? I think, and all the articles you read, there's a debate: should it be 706 or should it be Title II? I think that we have to have a clear eyed understanding of what has made the Internet what it is today and what basic values need to be protected and preserved. And then what that is going to look like. And there's more, on top of all of this. Can anyone here today piece together the effects of a Comcast Time Warner merger and an AT&T DirecTV merger on consumers and a free and Open Internet? These are massive decisions, and massive pieces that are moving forward. And what's going to happen to innovation?

Mr. Chairman, Chairman Walden, I urge you to convene a hearing to examine these issues here. I think they deserve to be examined and to be debated and questions asked. So, as I said earlier, every person in the country will be affected by the outcome of these decisions that are before the commission and before us. And, so I look forward to questioning Chairman Wheeler today.

I also ask for unanimous consent that two letters, two very important letters be entered into the record. One, signed by more than a hundred venture capitalists and angel investors who support simple, strong, enforceable rules against online discrimination and access fees. And the other, signed by more than 100 Internet companies, small and large. Mostly small. That support a free and Open Internet.

WALDEN: Without objection.

ESHOO: And I don't know if I have any time remaining. No. I think I've gone over. Well, with that, I'll yield back what I don't have.

WALDEN: Thank the gentlelady for her opening statement and the letters. We'll now turn to the full committee chairman, Mr. Fred Upton, from Michigan for opening comments.

UPTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Oversight is a critical part of this committee's work to foster a smaller, more nimble government for the innovation age. We've held lots of hearings, with all of the FCC's commissioners to address issues of national importance, to keep a close eye on the budget, and to ensure that commission process focusing on promoting jobs and innovation, and today's oversight hearing with Chairman Wheeler will continue that discussion to ensure that the FCC works in a way that benefits consumers, industry and certainly the economy. And I thank you for coming today.

There's a lot to discuss. In the six months since Mr. Wheeler was confirmed as char he has addressed a number of items, including media ownership, the IP transition, universal service and just this past week, of course, the incentive auctions and net neutrality. While I appreciate the chairman's leadership, on one of these I have serious concerns with some others.

As an initial matter, Chairman Wheeler started off his chairmanship with a review of FCC procedure, an issue that this subcommittee has spent lots of time working to reform in a bipartisan manner. But, I was disappointed to see some of the process failures that occurred last week. Media reports of an Open Meeting item being circulated to commissioners as late as midnight the evening before the vote on one item, in what seems to be partisan sharing of items with Democrats as much as 24 hours before sharing them with Republicans on another is particularly concerning. Regardless of political affiliation, commissioners must be given adequate and equal time to consider the items on which they're going to vote. Let us all hope that such incidents of favoritism and selective sharing are isolated and not emblematic of the chairman's new operating procedure.

Additionally, I continue to be concerned with the commission's ongoing defiance of its statutory obligations to complete the 2010 quadrennial review of media ownership rules. Despite the commission's woefully outdated record on this issue, it has nonetheless moved forward with changes that effectively bar joint sales agreements and change commission treatment of shared service agreements under its media attribution rules. These actions, in the absence of the statutorily required media ownership review, do raise significant questions about the commission's commitment to making decisions informed by facts and utilizing sound process.

And, lastly, I am troubled by the chairman's insistence on attempting to regulate the Internet under rules that were informed by 19th Century railroad regs, and adopted to regulate the monopoly telephone network of the past. The Internet has indeed flourished under the current light touch regulatory scheme, and subjecting to burdensome regs is a leap in the wrong direction. Title II is inappropriate for the Internet, and attempting to reclassify it would be harmful to consumers, businesses and the future of the Internet as we know it. Nobody wants telephone service to look like it did in 1984, and we certainly shouldn't wish for our Internet access to return to that rotary phone era either. The communications sector is vital to our national economy and commission auction - action on even small items can have broad impact. I thank Chairman Wheeler for being here today. Look forward to working together toward a bipartisan, measured, transparent and responsible actions that do benefit consumers, job creation and our economy. And I yield my balance of my time to be split between Mr. Latta and Mr. Barton.

LATTA: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman for yielding and Chairman Walden I appreciate you holding this hearing today, and welcome Chairman Wheeler. Thanks for being here.

The communications and technology industry is heralded as a vibrant, dynamic and productive sector of our economy. This is not by accident, as networks and services transition to IP based platforms, they've had the flexibility to grow, advance and evolve in large part because they have not been subjected to the stifling hand of legacy government regulation. We've pursued a light touch regulatory approach to the Internet ecosystem, because we've seen time and again, that it serves as a catalyst for increased investment, innovation, job creation and competition.

As I look forward to develop policies that would further this growth, we'd be remiss to overlook the significance of how regulatory restraint has been fundamental - a fundamental component of the industry's success. That's why I'm concerned with some of the proposals emerging from the FCC, particularly in consideration of reclassifying broadband Internet access service, telecommunications service under Title II of the Communications Act. This policy would be an extreme exercise of government overreach and likely result in failed websites, downgraded and poor customer service, less choice and flexibility for consumers, businesses and stifling of innovation through regulation.

Unwanted attempts to manufacture and shape markets outcomes propose solutions in search of problems impose antiquated regulation will frustrate future progress and innovation. I intend to introduce legislation that prevents the FCC from following through on this misguided regulatory proposal. Mr. Chairman, with that I yield back the balance of my time. And I yield to Mr. Barton.

BARTON: (AUDIO GAP) We just welcomed Chairman Wheeler and the question before the committee today are we soon going to be calling him Mr. Wheeler Dealer? With that, I - I'll put my statement in the record in the interest of time, and yield back to the chairman.

WALDEN: Thank you, Chairman. Gentleman yields back. Now turn to the gentleman from California, Mr. Waxman for opening comments.

WAXMAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I want to welcome back Chairman Wheeler. The Federal Communications Commission had a historic week last week. You are tackling some of the most complex and pressing issues in the communications sector today.

In 2012, Congress gave the FCC a big job: create the world's first incentive auction to ensure that beachfront, low band spectrum is put to its highest economic value, and you established the ground rules for this crucial auction last week. You had a hard job, because you needed to balance four potential - potentially conflicting objectives. One, maximizing the amount of spectrum made available for auction. Two, promote competition. Three, create bands of unlicensed spectrum to spur innovation. And, four, raise money. It appears you hit this one out of the ballpark.

I particularly want to commend you for your work to advance unlicensed spectrum. Your plan will create three channels of beachfront, unlicensed spectrum throughout the nation. The vision of new, super Wi-Fi can now become a reality.

I also want to commend you for promoting competition, by reserving spectrum for competitive carriers. It would be an enormous setback for innovation and consumers if the incentive auction turns the wireless market into a duopoly, dominated by Verizon and AT&T. This auction is the best, and possibly the last, chance the FCC has to invigorate competition.

I would have preferred if you reserved even more spectrum for competitive carriers, but I recognize the pressures you are under and your need to secure three votes. By the way, you may hear arguments today from Republicans on this committee that you lack the authority to promote competition. These claims are nonsense and contradict the express language of the statute.

Last week you also launched the FCC's third attempt in eight years to protect the Open Internet. You didn't hit this one out of the park, but you didn't need to, either. You made a wide decision to solicit comment on a wide range of options. As I wrote you, this time has come to - wrote you, the time has come to end the legal gymnastics and stop the lobbying games being played by the big broadband providers.

In 2010, Verizon, AT&T and Comcast pled with the FCC not to use its undisputed authority under Title II of the Communications Act. And, then, after FCC did what they wanted, Verizon sued the agency for lacking authority when the FCC agreed with the company. This time, you need a different approach. You should use your Title II authority as a backstop authority to protect the Open Internet. If you want to proceed under Section 706, as your main legal theory that's fine. But you shouldn't water down the Open Internet rules to fit Section 706. Instead, you should get the substance right, and invoke Title II as an independent basis of authority.

The FCC has already lost two rulings in court over the Open Internet. You don't have to choose between weak rules and a weak legal case. You can issue strong rules, and have a strong legal case, if you use a belt and suspender approach to the next rule making. I look forward to exploring this issue with you further in the question period. In the meantime, I want to yield the balance of my time to my friend and colleague, Congresswoman Matsui.

MATSUI: Thank you very much, Ranking Member Waxman, for yielding me time and welcome, Chairman Wheeler. The FCC certainly has a lot on its plate. The commission is considering net neutrality rules, rules on the broadcast incentive auction, the AWS-III auction, USF and E- Rate reforms in two very significant mergers. I'm confident the FCC will be able to demonstrate that it can walk and chew gum at the same time.

This subcommittee should also do its part. For one, I join in calling for the chairman to hold oversight hearings on the two proposed mergers between Comcast and Time Warner. And on AT&T and DirecTV. Both are some of the largest mergers in our nation's telecommunications history. Americans, including many in my district of Sacramento, are seeing the trends towards consolidation, content and peering deals, and how they hear phrases like, paid prioritization, and wondering what is going on? What does all this mean for them, for competition and for the economy?

It has been encouraging that so many Americans are speaking up in support of protecting an Open Internet. I was one who thought the FCC should have taken more time to deliberate on what net neutrality rules the commission should propose. But we are where we are. The proposal has certainly improved over the last few weeks. It is still far from perfect. I support a ban on paid prioritization deals. We can't afford a two tiered Internet system.

I look forward from hearing from you today, and I yield back the balance of my time.

WALDEN: Gentlelady yields back the balance of her time. And with that, you've heard from us, or at least a few of us up here, Mr. Chairman. Now, we're delighted to have you here, and we look forward to your - your opening statement and comments. And thank you, again, for the work you're doing. Go ahead.

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and members of the - of the committee. As you've pointed out, it's been about six months since we last sat down. And what I wanted to do was to highlight some of the things that we have done in that period, and then engage in a dialogue with you with whatever topics that you would like to address.

As has been evidenced by a lot of these comments up here, one of the principal responsibilities of - of the commission is dealing with the spectrum crunch. And we have taken a significant step forward in terms of getting more spectrum out to the market. We had the H Block auction, which raised a billion and a half dollars for 10 MHz spectrum. We have opened a new 100MHz swath in the 5GHz band, which is already being referred to as gigabyte Wi-Fi, because of the incredible throughput that it enables.

We have begun a proceeding on spectrum sharing in 3.5 GHz, and we announced yesterday that in accord with the mandate of this committee and Congress to auction off AWS-III spectrum. That we will begin the auction on November 13th, and we will finish as per your mandate February - we will license February 22, 2015.

We have also, as some of the committee had noted established a new set of mobile spectrum holding rules, which have been praised by everybody from public interest groups to small operators, to large operators as - as was commented by Mr. Waxman, hitting the ball out of the park. And we have begun the incentive auction process. It's - you mandated us as - as you've said, with a non-trivial task. And we have - we have taken the first important steps to that.

On the question of universal service and what's going on there, we have fulfilled the pledge that I made to this committee last time we were together, to eliminate the infamous quantile regression analysis. And, we're seeking comments on what its replacement should be. We have funded the Connect America fund to provide connectivity to five million more Americans who do not have access to broadband today. That's about a third of the total, and a significant bite out of - out of that. And we're seeking input on multiple additional issues: throughput standards, should we, as - as technology increases and bandwidth increases, do we need to think about higher bandwidth that is supported by the Connect America fund? How do we best deal with the mobile component of broadband delivery in Connect America? And how best to support broadband for rate of return carriers? Those are all proceedings that we have underway.

We have - we have made some significant strides, also, in the area of public safety. We took a good chunk out of the FirstNet $7.5 billion with the H-Band auction. Expect, obviously, that the AWS-III auction will do more and I wouldn't be surprised if we show up at the incentive auction having met the requirement, or at least taking a huge bite out of the requirement for funding FirstNet.

We had a rule making on text to 911, you know, phones aren't used just for talking anymore, but texting and - and so if you want to text to an emergency service provider, we had a rule making on that, the major carriers stepped up and literally in the last couple of days, they all met their goals for implementation on that, which is a terrific step forward. And we've also initiated a further notice on location accuracy, because as wireless usage increases and particularly as it replaces what's - wired line connections inside, and as GPS usage has increased, there's been a fascinating reality that location accuracy has actually declined. And, we've got a notice going on how do we address that, because that's literally a matter of life and death.

As you mentioned we began the 2014 quadrennial review on media issues with a - an expedited delivery date. We closed a loophole that was being exploited to get around the ownership rules, using joint services agreement, and we brought competition back to the retransmission consent negotiations. We have also continued to press on the reform issues that so many of you and I share in common as being important.

Last time we were together, I told you we stood up a task force to deal with this. That task force came back with 154 recommendations. About three quarters of those are now well along their way to being in process. They kind of break into two parts. There are procedural issues that you might associate with administrative procedure act, and things like this. And there's also just how do you make the agency more efficient?

And last week, as many have discussed, we opened a Notice of Proposed Rulemaking on preserving and protecting the Open Internet. It's important to recognize that there are no protections for an Open Internet in place today. The January court decision affirmed the commission's authority under Section 706 to deal with the Open Internet, and identified what I call a road map for how to achieve that. And what I have proposed in a method that follows that road map.

I understand that there is a great debate on this issue. I heard the debate here this morning. Between those who say there is no need and those who say it ought to be a regulated utility. What we have tried to do is to follow the court's direction, the road map, the blueprint, and to come up with a proposal that stops blocking, that prohibits anything that degrades a consumer's access, including prioritization. That asks a broader question about prioritization as to whether it should be banned outright, and if so, how, and then engages in the discussion that we've heard already this morning about Title II versus 706, and collecting a broad scope of learned information on that.

I've consistently said that there is only one Internet. There's not a fast Internet and a slow Internet. There's not special service Internet and non. There is one Internet, and the - when the consumer buys access to the Internet, they are buying access to the full Internet. And that's what our rules attempt to protect. This has become a debate among legal approaches - about legal approaches.

It's a healthy debate. It's a debate that our Notice of Proposed Rulemaking furthers with multiple requests for input, but my position has been similar to that of the Consumer Federation of America, and that is that we ought to explore the powers that are granted in the '96 act, specifically Section 706, keep asking how Title II fits in, but develop a regulatory policy that looks forward not backward, because what we need is a regulatory plan for the 21st Century. And I look forward to discussing that with you, Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee.

WALDEN: Mr. Wheeler, chairman, thank you for being here. We appreciate your work, and - and your willingness to come and spend some time with us and - and respond to our questions.

I want to pick up on the Middle Class Tax Relief Act, which as you know, was designed to create a forum where broadcasters could volunteer their spectrum up for auction, for mobile broadband use. Never been done quite like proposed, and you've got, we - we all knew that going in, but it seemed like a good balance. The critical term in all of this was that the broadcasters would volunteer to put their spectrum up, they wouldn't be forced into it. That was the agreement. Yet, many of the actions that we've seen coming out of the commission would lead some to believe that the FCC might be bulling broadcasters into giving up spectrum without providing hard data and clear models so that the broadcasters can thoroughly and thoughtfully deliberate and choose to participate or not in this first of its kind auction.

Let me tell you what I'm - I'm thinking here. For example, the joint sales agreements that are now outlawed. These agreements essentially offer broadcasters a viable business model in small markets that would otherwise suffer from lack of service. You're considering the attribution value of UHF stations, such that more broadcasters could end up in violation of that the national cap under the broadcast ownership rule, and the FCC has failed to process broadcasters' petitions for allocation changes from VHF to UHF, even though the petitions were filed prior to Middle Class Tax Relief Act.

And, finally, you're seeking to use a modified version of OET-69. I'm hearing about this to repack broadcasters. This will likely result in reduced coverage for broadcasters that choose to stay in the business, making the business itself less viable. So ,the very people you're trying to incent to put spectrum, so that it'll be available for auction, I think are - are concerned about where the commission's headed in a number of areas. Can you explain to me how these actions will actually encourage broadcasters to participate in this auction?

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think the goal here, that we have been trying to follow, is - is not to discourage or to encourage, but to follow through with our responsibilities. And - and that means enforcing and updating our rules ...

WALDEN: Do you think any of these, though, do you think any of these things I've just cited encourage broadcasters to participate more? If you don't have broadcasters showing up with spectrum ...

WHEELER: So, I -I, as I said, Mr. Chairman, I -I don't think that we have an important, as you said, an important and historic role. This is an incentive auction.

WALDEN: I'm aware of that. Yes.

WHEELER: What we have tried to do in the mobile spectrum holdings rule, for instance, is to encourage broadcasters -encourage, I'm sorry, wireless carriers to buy, which creates the incentive. The interesting thing, there was a -a report by one of the Wall Street analysts last week who said we expect the greatest risk to this auction, broadcasters not showing up, just dropped. Because the fact that AT&T suggested that they're ready to bid between $9 and $18 billion ...

WALDEN: Right.

WHEELER: ...for 20 to 40MHz, this analyst said should send positive signals to broadcasters. So, our goal is to...

WALDEN: All right ...

WHEELER: ...is to create this marketplace and we're not trying to take regulatory action ...

WALDEN: All right, well ...

WHEELER: in -in unrelated areas that would ...

WALDEN: But you are taking lots of regulatory actions, and it does have an effect on the marketplace. I mean, those two are facts. (AUDIO GAP) If -if we don't have these broadcasters coming to the table voluntarily, there won't be spectrum available. So, I want to steal a line from the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, and that this one I refer to as Mr. Dingle, to see if I can get, just sort of some yes or nos here. Will you commit that the FCC will not score television stations based on their (AUDIO GAP). That's yes, actually. That you will commit that you will not score it. Will you commit the FCC, is that correct?

WHEELER: Yes.

WALDEN: Yes. You will commit the FCC will ensure that broadcasters' cost to reallocate are covered by the $1.75 billion relocation fund?

WHEELER: We believe that that fund will be adequate. That's - that's ....

WALDEN: OK.

WHEELER: ...that's what Congress told us to spend. Period.

WALDEN: And will you commit to completing frequency coordination with Canada and Mexico before the auction?

WHEELER: I think the issue there is what is the term complete? As you know on the DTV transition it never came down to actual signing on paper, but we understood where each other were, and I am very confident that we will be at that kind of a point.

WALDEN: Because that's critical. And will you commit to revoking only those low powered TV and translator licenses that are necessary to complete the auction?

WHEELER: Yes.

WALDEN: Thank you. And, I think I'm out of time. So, with that, I would now yield to the gentlelady, my friend from California, Miss Eshoo.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. A lot of things to discuss, but I want to bore down on, or bore into some of the particulars on your recent proposal relative to -to the Internet, on net neutrality. I've argued, many advocates for net neutrality have argued that paid prioritization represents a fundamental departure from the Internet as we know it. I -I'm just kind of restating what is obvious, but I think that when you have hundreds of thousands of people communicating from across the country to you on it, that it is -that it's important to raise. Now, as a policy, not as a legal question, do you think that paid prioritization should be blocked outright?

WHEELER: So, I have said, Congresswoman, that I don't believe there ought to have and have nots.

ESHOO: No, no, just answer my question.

WHEELER: That -- that -that ...

ESHOO: Just tell me. Do you think that it should be blocked outright?

WHEELER: We have asked that question in the rulemaking. And - and what I have said is that I believe that under Section 706, anything that is anti-competitive or anti-consumer is competitively unreasonable and therefore can and should be blocked. And that becomes the trigger for how you deal with paid prioritization.

ESHOO: Yes, now what happens ...

WHEELER: On the question of per se that you asked...

ESHOO: Yes.

WHEELER: ...we've specifically asked how and whether.

ESHOO: Now, what happens if the FCC determines that there's no outright -no way to outright - create an outright ban, and these paid agreements under 706, where does that leave you? Where does that leave the country?

WHEELER: So - so when the court gave us our instructions, they talked about what they called the virtuous cycle, and that is that - that content drives the need for conduit, which then creates the opportunity for content. And that this cycle is what it is our responsibility to protect. And that's - that's what 706 authorizes us to protect. And so what my proposal is is that we take them up on that. And we say if there is something that interferes with that virtuous cycle, which I believe paid prioritization does, that then we can move against it.

ESHOO: Yes. All right. But, now let's move over to Title II. Title II is described, it depends on who's describing it, it's either a scourge --it's been compared to the early railroad regulations in our country - to being the flip side, you know, the savior title. I talked about in my opening statement about the - the - one of the imprimaturs of the Internet has been consistent innovation. And, while there are those that, and I understand why people would move to Title II, because they want the Internet protected, and these values are -they're worth protecting. But I also believe that there is room for, in Title II, for heavy handed regulation, and I don't think that, well, let me put it this way, I think that we need a light but strengthful legal touch in this. Because the values are so essential, and people across the country, and in the world, I mean, I'm hearing from people from different parts of the world as well, are calling for these protections. How would you envision - how would you handle constraint under Title II?

WHEELER: Well ...

ESHOO: In terms of being the chief regulator?

WHEELER: So, as you know ...

ESHOO: Have you given thought to this?

WHEELER: Pardon me?

ESHOO: Have you given thought to this?

WHEELER: Yes, ma'am.

ESHOO: OK.

WHEELER: And -and as you know ...

ESHOO: As some people say share it with me.

WHEELER: As you know Title II, there is nothing in Title II that prohibits paid prioritization. As a matter of fact we have all kinds of paid prioritization exists ...

ESHOO: You're ...

WHEELER: ...today.

ESHOO: You're worrying me by bringing that up first. But anyway, go ahead.

WHEELER: So -so that, no, because it goes to you, I think, the root question of yours which is how do you forbear from that?

ESHOO: Yes.

WHEELER: OK? And - and so - so it is possible to go through and say, yes, we will not do this, we will not do this, we will not do this. In the - in the wireless context, interestingly enough, Congress created that - created wireless as a common carrier, but then specifically said but this doesn't apply, and this doesn't apply, and this doesn't apply.

ESHOO: Yes.

WHEELER: We can do that as a commission, as well. It has been proposed that that's an approach to take. There are also those who throw up their hands and ooh in great concern over that because they say, OK, well this commission may do this, but what about the next commission? And you can't bind a future commission by making those kinds of - of determinations. So, what we have done in this NPRM is to ask the specific question about here's Section 706, here's Title II, let's compare them and contrast them with each other, and tell us what the pluses and minuses and the best ways to get through this are? And I think that leads us to the kind of answer that you're asking for today.

WALDEN: The gentlelady's time's expired. We'll go now to the gentlelady from Tennessee, Miss Blackburn, the Vice Chair of the full committee, for her questions.

BLACKBURN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And Mr. Wheeler, we thank you for taking the time to come and be with us. You've got a feisty term going over there, at the FCC, and in Tennessee we would say you're kicking up a little dust. And, it's causing concern.

Many of our content creators have a tremendous amount of concern about your approach, and many of our health care innovators, who are looking at apps in telemedicine concepts and things of that nature, are also expressing concern. And I think that probably your actions have inserted a good bit of uncertainty into the innovation sector that is looking at how we best utilize all things Internet to - for quality of life and access for economic development for health care, for - for innovation and I've got just a couple of simple questions for you.

First of all, on cost benefit analysis, and I thank you that last night your team sent a letter over to us on that question, but what concerns me was that in the letter you say that this is just a tool. Cost benefit analysis is just one of many tools that would go into your decision. And your NPRM does not include an initial cost benefit analysis, and your predecessor, Mr. Genachowski, in this committee came before us and assured us he was going to use this and I'm actually going to read you his statement that he gave to us. He said, during my tenure I brought particular focus to this process, including the - by directing the early involvement of our chief economist and the analytical process of rulemaking, and by having FCC staff consult with the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs on best practices in conducting cost benefit analysis.

And I - I think it is an incredibly important component of this, to look at what the cost of net neutrality rules would be to the consumer, and also to industry, so I want to know from you: are you going to give us a commitment right now that you will conduct a thorough and extensive cost benefit analysis of the actual cost to the consumer and to industry on these rules?

WHEELER: Thank you, Ms. Blackburn, I agree that cost benefit analysis are crucial to decision making. And in this rulemaking we specifically ask what are the costs of one approach or another? And what are the benefits, one or another? So that we can collect that information and have that kind of analysis. I agree with the importance of cost benefit analysis.

BLACKBURN: OK. Let me ask you this, also. You know, the commission's fund really comes from those that are regulated by the FCC, but we have some that are not. They're impacted by this, but they are not regulated and paying those fees, so in the net neutrality context, for example, companies like Google and Netflix want the FCC to act on their behalf, and petition or visit the agency, if you will, in support of those efforts, but they free ride because they are not paying the fees and bearing that part of the regulatory burden. So, since they seem so ready and willing to rely on regulation to help them, with their business models, how would you recommend that those entities share in the cost, pay their part of the costs, funding the agency?

WHEELER: With all respect, that's above my pay grade. That's a decision that - that this committee and the Congress can make in setting those rules ...

BLACKBURN: I'm asking for what your recommendation would be? They come and they lobby you, and ...

WHEELER: So ...

BLACKBURN: ...and they're pushing the net neutrality rules, and while they may like what you are saying, because they want you to step in, we have a lot of people out there who are paying the fees that are not in favor of what you are doing, and we have a lot of innovators who are not in favor of what you are doing, and your door has the name chairman on it, so I'm asking what is your perspective?

WHEELER: So, our - our effort in all of this is to represent the American people, not company a or company b. We have been told by the Congress, from whom we can collect regulatory fees and we do. If there is a decision that we should collect regulatory fees from somebody else, that's something we obviously will take. If there is a decision that we should expand regulatory authority over other entities, that's obviously something we should do. But that is a decision that is out of our hands.

BLACKBURN: I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back. The chairman recognizes the gentlelady from California, Miss Matsui, for her questions.

MATSUI: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Chairman Wheeler, I'd like to understand, given the success of the Internet and the absence of prioritization, precisely what types of paid prioritization you believe will speed the deployment and adoption of broadband Internet access services? Given that paid prioritization agreements would be used as a barrier of entry to startup and small business, what prioritization arrangements, specifically, will be better for the Internet than the no prioritization norm we have today?

WHEELER: What we are trying to do in this item is to say that anything that affects that virtuous cycle that the court talked about, and I talked about before, is not appropriate. Is unlawful. And that would include paid prioritization. Now, the court told us to look at this on a case by case basis. We have asked the question in the rulemaking as to whether we should look at it generically, and say it's all out. And we're soliciting comments on that. But, you know, the concept of paid prioritization when I buy Internet access, I am buying the full pipe. I am buying access to everything that's out there, and if somebody comes along and says, oh, no, you can't get this unless you pay more, that's unreasonable, and should be banned. If somebody comes along and says to a content provider, you can't get on unless you pay more, that's unreasonable and that would not be permitted.

MATSUI: OK, well. You know, as for my part, other than public - public safety, I believe paid prioritization should be banned. I also think another concern here is the last mile equivalent we're seeing in peering. The fact that there's so much uncertainty with paid prioritization is troublesome. If this concept moves forward, we could inadvertently block the next Google or Amazon from the market without even knowing it. I'm concerned that your hands may be tied here. Even if the commission wanted to ban anti-competitive paid prioritization deals, you may not have the authority or tools to do so.

Chairman Wheeler, if you were to explain to my constituents what is occurring in the market right now with the two mergers, content and peering agreements, and now paid prioritization could be legitimized under a commercially reasonable standard. What would you tell them? Not just what it means for them, but also for competition and for economy as a whole

WHEELER: I would tell them that I felt that paid prioritization was commercially unreasonable, and therefore could be dealt with. And, that, on the question of peering, that that is a separate issue that the commission needs to look at and will be looking at. But I would emphasize that I am strong supporter of the Open Internet.

And I would also tell them a story that when I was an entrepreneur, I was shut out of cable systems, because they were closed networks. And, I would come with a new product and couldn't get on. And, then when I was a venture capitalist, before taking this job, that the companies that I was backing had to have access to the Internet, could only succeed if they had access to the Internet. So, I would say to them that I believe in an Open Internet. I've experienced closed networks and the harm they cause to innovation, and that I want to protect and preserve an Open Internet.

MATSUI: you know, I think this is a very critical time. When I have ordinary people, probably (ph) off the street, coming to me and asking me about all these things they've heard, because people today really depend on the Internet. Ordinary citizens, the entrepreneurs who are concerned about this, and who else we know - we may not know out there. So, it's very concerning to all of us that there is a potential that we may have a situation where we won't have an Open Internet. And I would also like you to consider some of these mergers. I mean, we feel like we're kind of in the Wild West of the digital economy now. And now with mergers coming forward. Can you commit to us, these large mergers that are before us, they may be different from each other, but can you commit to us here that the FCC will carefully scrutinize these deals? With a focus toward public interest?

WHEELER: Without hesitation. And with complete affirmation.

MATSUI: OK, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: Chair now recognizes former chairman of the full committee, Mr. Barton, for his questions.

BARTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I want to echo the last question you asked Chairman Wheeler about low powered television. You and I are working on a bill, hopefully, to give them some protection. We understand that under current law they - they - they don't have standing when they repackage, but we hope to give them some at least priority or some help if and when we do do these repackaging of the spectrums. So I wanted to commend you for that last question.

I've listened Chairman Wheeler, to my friends on the Democratic side repeatedly talk about the Open Internet and whether you should try to regulate it under Section 706 or Title II. I think you're asking a false question. The Internet is open.

The question is what does the FCC do in terms of monitoring to make sure that it stays open? And, the analogy I'm going to use is not perfect, but I think it is instructive and educational. The airways that we fly back and forth from Washington to our districts are open, but they are regulated and monitored for a number of reasons by the FAA. If I call up American Airlines, and I say, I want to go from Washington -Reagan to DFW, they quote me a price, let's say it's $350 one way. But when I show up with my ticket, I get one seat on that plane. I don't' get to take a hundred of my friends, and put them on the plane with me because I happen to buy the ticket first, and show up first.

BARTON: So, it's obvious that it would be great for $350 if I could fill the plane.

But we allow the airlines to price by volume. You want one ticket, it's $350. You want two tickets, it's $700. Maybe if you want to buy the whole plane, they do give you a discount. It's only $250, but we don't let the first person to buy the ticket use the whole plane for $350.

And for all the bold talk about open access, what people are really trying to do is, you know, I want to pay a minimum price and get all this broadband, and I want to download everything from Netflix, and I don't want to pay if I download every movie they rent, or vice versa.

Netflix pays a basic price, and they can service 10 million people, instead of whatever it would be. So, you know, this -- this -- the broadband providers who have spent billions and billions of dollars, and have -- have networked this country and provided access through the competitive market principles, are not going to somehow, all of a sudden decide, as long as the FCC, which under your chairmanship, makes sure that it stays a competitive model.

They're -- they're going to continue to provide an open internet, but they may want to provide based on volume of use, some sort of a pricing system that allocates that it isn't a limited spectrum.

I see no reason to try to shoehorn some sort of a regulatory approach into either Title II, or Section 706, you know. Explain to me why my approach, which is what we've been doing and which works, is the wrong approach.

WHEELER: Let me see if I can respond to both parts of your question. First, on LPTV, we -- as I said to the chairman, we do not want to move those who don't have to be moved as part of it.

We also believe that there is opportunities to go to digital and the new efficiencies that that brings, just like it did in the -- in the Class A stations. And thirdly, we're opening a new rulemaking to specifically deal with that. So because we agree with the importance of low power and -- and translators.

To your -- to the second part of your question, let me take the chairman's hat off, and put my consumer hat on for a second, because two weekends ago, I called my ISP, and increased my capacity, because I wanted faster true plan (ph).

And they said for another $10 a month, we'll give you another, what turned out to be like, 20 MB. That's a marketplace transaction. That's something that's accepted now. That is not something that is part of the open internet rules.

What the open internet rules are trying to say, is that when I buy that capacity, I've bought that ride to every place on the internet, that somebody can't turn around and say oh, but you can't get that, or somebody can't turn around and say well, you can deliver that, Tom, but you've got to pay me an extra fee.

And so the concept of the open internet is that I have bought this broad pathway, and I have the right to use it, unfettered, in a -- on an open basis, and that's what we're trying to deliver in this rulemaking.

BARTON: I'm not -- my time's expired. I'm not trying to oppose that, but if you want -- you're looking at it from the consumer standpoint, that everybody should have access, but if you are a provider of content, you should be willing to pay more based on the number of items you're going to put at any given time on the open internet, so that everybody has access to it.

Because if you have a constrained pipeline, somebody has to make a decision how you put things into the pipeline, whether it's the airplane, or whether it's the airways, or the internet. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I yield back.

WALDEN: Gentleman yields back, the chair now recognizes the former chairman on the Democratic side, Mr. Waxman.

CHAIRMAN HENRY WAXMAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Chairman Wheeler, I commended your leadership earlier in my opening statement, about the spectrum auction, so I want to ask questions about a different subject, and that's net neutrality.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

WAXMAN: I commend you for tackling this issue, and for seeking comment on a broad range of issues, but I have serious concerns about some proposals that have been discussed. You've said that there would be presumption against broadband providers like Verizon, AT&T, and Comcast, entering into arrangements that give exclusive advantage, to their affiliates. Is that right?

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

WAXMAN: OK. What I don't understand, is why this presumption against exclusive arrangements would be limited to affiliates. Suppose Netflix entered into an exclusive arrangement with AT&T or Comcast for faster speeds for its videos that block competitors like Amazon Prime, from getting similar service.

I think that would be a serious threat to competition and an open internet, yet your proposal does not create a presumption against these exclusive arrangements. Why would you allow any exclusive arrangement that guarantees some content providers faster speeds than competitors can access?

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Waxman. This goes to the -- back to this virtuous (ph) cycle that the court talked about, and you know, it was interesting, yesterday in the Wall Street Journal, there was an article that interviewed a bunch of infrastructure manufacturers about the impact on that neutrality.

And they flat out said that if you offer fast lanes for some, you're going to degrade service for others. And I think that's at the heart of what you're talking about here. That would be commercially unreasonable under our proposal.

WAXMAN: OK. The problem with exclusive arrangements is they would let some companies block their competition from similar advantages. In markets where there are -- there is no, or only limited choices of broadband providers, that would stifle openness and competition.

I just want to say to you that I'm opposed to any form of paid prioritization. Paid prioritization divides the internet into the haves and the have-nots, and it will entrench the big companies at the expense of startups.

My understanding is that you've asked comment on a multi-factor test for determining whether -- determining when paid prioritization is permissible, and when it would be prohibited. My concern is that this will create a lot of ambiguity, and a lot of litigation.

I believe right lines would be much better for the market, and for innovation, so I'm going to ask you to consider a presumption against all paid prioritization as you develop final rules. Will you -- will you agree to consider this option?

WHEELER: Absolutely, and we have asked in the NPRM (ph) specifically whether, and if so, how do you accomplish it? So that is -- that is a ripe debate that is in the NPRM right now, sir.

WAXMAN: My understanding is that the reason you had proposed a complicated, multi-factored test, is concern about the court ruling. And I agree that if you're limited to acting under section 706, your options could be limited.

But if you are not limited to Section 706, you could establish a presumption against paid prioritization under Title II, and that's why it's so important for us -- for you to use your Title II authority as back stop authority.

You don't have to settle for a weak open internet rules if you exercise your full powers. And I'm glad you're looking at that possibility. Let me close by thanking you for seeking comment on the back stop proposal in the proposal adopted last week.

I'm committed to working with you to ensure the commission adopts strong and open internet protections for consumers and innovators, while encouraging continued investment in the online content and services we all rely on and enjoy today.

I think it's important that we get the substance right. We tried three times, we meaning you, at the FCC, because of the concern that the consumer have full access to what is on the internet, and full access to be able to use the internet to its greatest and maximum potential, and I would hate to see that net neutrality in any way be diminished if we have an opportunity under the law, as we look at it, to make sure that we get the substance right.

WALDEN: Thank you.

WAXMAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back his time, and now turn to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, the vice chair of the subcommittee, Mr. Latta.

LATTA: Well thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and again, Chairman Wheeler, thanks very much again for being here. There has been some discussion on Title II, and I'd like to follow up on some of that questioning.

Central premise of Title II regulation always been that the regulation was a substitute for competition. And two parts with a question, then. What types of findings have the commission made to justify entertaining the idea of Title II regulation of the internet?

And then do you believe the SEC should have to make a specific showing that of a market failure reform proposing rate regulation, or reporting requirements, that are the precursor to rate regulation?

WHEELER: So again, this -- these are the kinds of questions that we have tried assiduously not to decide on, but to ask about in this rulemaking. We're going to have to make a decision on exactly those questions at some point in time.

But what we want to achieve, is a record that gives everybody the opportunity to opine on that, so that we can be appropriately informed.

LATTA: Well let me ask you, what's your time line on that, then?

WHEELER: So we've got 60 days for comments, and then 45 days for reply comments.

LATTA: OK, so are you saying then that you're not ruling out rate regulation?

WHEELER: I'm saying we have asked the question about Title II, and -- and the full panoply of Title II. Yes, sir.

LATTA: OK, well -- let me ask you this, what have you been hearing from the community thus far, especially when you're saying that you are asking those questions, what have you -- what have you been hearing out there?

WHEELER: Excuse me. Well we have -- we've heard very little on the record thus far. There has been a great outpouring of people speaking to us through the press, people speaking to us through letters, and this sort of thing.

And as I indicated at the outset, there are two, diametrically opposed positions. One is that you should not do anything, and the other is that it should go all the way to being regulated like a public utility.

And our job is to find that which is best for consumers and best for encouraging investment in the internet, which itself is best for consumers.

LATTA: Let me go on with this question, while you've resolved some of the issues in the 5 GHz rulemaking, there are number of issues outstanding that have the potential to open up another 195 MHz of spectrum for unlicensed use. What is the FCC's and your plan for tackling the open issues?

WHEELER: In the 5 GHz?

LATTA: Right.

WHEELER: So there's -- there's -- actually think about 5 GHz, and 3 bytes. The first byte we've -- we've dealt with. That's the lower end of 5 GHz. In the middle component of 5 GHz, there are lots of national defense kind of activities, radar, and this sort of thing.

And the question is how can you work out sharing arrangements there? And we're working with those parties. On the upper end, is where you have spectrum that has been identified for intelligent traffic, ITFS, kinds of activities.

And that is based around the 802.11 standard. There are strong feelings about the need to protect that. I believe that it's possible to work together to meet both sets of needs, since it's based around a common 802.11 standard.

LATTA: Yeah, and in my remaining time, let me ask this last question, the SEC's 2011 universal service transformation, or transformation order, requires phone companies to set minimum prices that they can charge their consumers if they -- if the provider wants to continue receiving the same amount of funds from the US (inaudible) to support the high cost of the business.

So as a result, many of our rural consumers, the lot that I represent out there, will see the rate forward (ph) go from $14 to about $20.46. And while the communications act requires rural rates to be reasonably comparable to rates in urban areas, as affordable, reasonably comparable does not necessarily mean that the rural rate should be exactly the same as the urban rate when the rural customer might be able to call, only a few thousand people locally want urban call many times more than that.

And then should the rate be the same in the rural areas where the average income is significantly lower than it might in fact not be as affordable. The rate floor continues to be a concern for many of our telecommunications providers in my district, and other servicing rural America, where I understand that the SEC has agree to phase in the increase at $2.00 per year, and proposed a start date until -- or postponed that start date until after 2015.

Can you explain why the FCC interprets the reasonably comparable rates to mean exactly the same rates between urban and rural areas, considering the smaller pipe (ph) relation of rural calling areas, and in fact, that it was what is affordable in the largest urban areas is not what is also affordable to consumers in the rural.

WHEELER: Thank you. I'm glad you asked that question, it's an important question. The -- so -- so, as you stated, we're supposed to make sure that things are reasonably comparable. The reason for that is to make sure that the subsidies that some Americans are paying to deliver service to other Americans, don't end up being subsidies that some Americans are paying to reduce the bills of other Americans, but to overcome the high cost of getting it to them.

In some instances, it has been unfortunately the former, there are in 16 states, there are situations where consumers are paying -- some consumers are paying $5.00 a month for telephone service, because they're being subsidized by people in your district and other districts.

We need to get our arms around that. So what we've done, is to say OK, step 1 is Jack (ph) goes into effect January 15. Then what we're going to do is -- and that can't be more than $2.00 by the way.

And then what we're going to do is go back out with another survey that hits the kind of granularity you were talking about in terms of service, including long distance and these kinds of things, so that we have a better understanding of exactly what comparable means, and then lock at that issue again.

LATTA: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My time has expired and I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back. The chair now recognizes chairman emeritus of the committee, the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Dingell.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, I thank you for your courtesy, and I commend you for holding this hearing. I'd like to welcome our old friend, Mr. Wheeler, back, fine public servant, and we're looking forward to good things of him.

Mr. Chairman, last week's open meeting, the commission adopted a number of big ticket items, including a new net neutrality NPRM, and draft rules for the upcoming incentive auction of broadcaster spectrum.

Concerning the former, I commend you for your efforts to keep the internet open, and will be watching the matter closely, as it goes forward. It's my hope the commission will work with this committee to ensure that any final action it takes to conform to its statutory authority, especially concerning Title II reclassification.

Now with respect to the incentive auction, I am interested in what the committee intends to do about treating broadcasters fairly. My questions will require a simple yes or no answer.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, I'd like to begin with a parochial matter. Section 6403 B1 of the middle class tax relief and job creation act specifies that the commission may, subject to international (inaudible) along the border with Mexico and Canada, reassign and relocate and reallocate broadcast frequencies. Is that correct?

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Now Chairman Wheeler, in the commission's joy (ph) to 2013 response to my letter of inquiry about the reverse auction, Gary Epstein, head of the commission's incentive auction taskforce stated the following, the language used in section 6403 B1 of the action is quote, identical to that used by the commission in describing its handling of the earlier DTV transition, in which the commission adopted our proposed allotments for these statements, subject to our continuing negotiations with Canada, notwithstanding the broadcaster's request.

To the contrary, one here could reasonably assume, based on the statement, that the commission may reassign and reallocate broadcast frequencies pursuant to the act, while negotiations with Canada and Mexico are still ongoing. Is that correct?

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: I'm going to ask you to submit for the record how you're going to assure protection to the broadcasters and the viewers in that process.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Now Mr. Wheeler, does the commission believe that concluding negotiations with Canada and Mexico, prior to commencing the reverse action, will give broadcasters, particularly in border regions, greater certainties and likely to increase the unwillingness to participate in this auction? Yes, or no?

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Wheeler, does the commission expect to conclude negotiations with Canada and Mexico prior to commencing the reverse action next year? Yes, or no?

WHEELER: The expectation is it is the goal.

DINGELL: You may not make it, is what you're saying.

WHEELER: It is -- it is the goal, and as we -- as I answered you in your previous point ...

DINGELL: Would you notify -- would you notify this committee as soon as that becomes likely or dangerous?

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Now in this matter, Mr. Chairman, I'd like to state for the record that it's my understanding, based on exchange with counsel at the energy and commerce subcommittee on communications and technology, December 1, 2011, markup of the border of the act, that border negotiations are to be completed before the commission reassigns broadcast channels.

I hope that Chairman Wheeler will honor that understanding. I hope, Mr. Chairman, you understand I have great apprehensions about that, because of the impact it should have on the broadcast, and also on my constituents.

WHEELER: Mr. Chairman, this is -- I share your deep concern about this, not only because of the very legitimate concern you have about your constituents and other Americans getting service along the border, but also the candlevering (ph) effect, if you will, as it then -- as spectrum allocation then goes into the middle of the country.

I can assure you this is an incredibly high priority. I can also assure you that our Canadian colleagues have been very forthcoming and very helpful ...

DINGELL: I would like to have this submitted for the record in response to correspondence. Now, Mr. Chairman, I note that the commission proposes to use a method called quote, scoring, to set individual prices for each broadcast station participation -- or participating in the reverse auction. Is that correct?

WHEELER: It is one of the things we're considering ...

DINGELL: One ...

WHEELER: We have not made the final decision yet.

DINGELL: There are others?

WHEELER: There -- we're looking at others ...

DINGELL: I'm going to ask that you submit, in response to correspondence, a proper answer on that ...

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: ... particular point. Now, Chairman Wheeler, is the commission concerned that scoring, as opposed to competitive bidding, will decrease broadcasters willingness to participate in the reverse auction? Yes, or no?

WHEELER: No.

DINGELL: Now Chairman Wheeler, in general, do you intend to work in good faith with broadcasters as the commission defines the rules for reverse auction in order to situate (ph) that their needs are met, as the action (ph) specifies -- as the act specifies, to the best of your abilities? Yes, or no?

WHEELER: Absolutely.

DINGELL: I want to quote Admiral Rickrover (ph), who once observed, the devil's in the details, but so is salvation. I'm hoping you're going to see that the salvation is there and not just that we are going to find ourselves amidst trouble because of carelessness, not by you, but by some of your over-enthusiastic and less-than- competent predecessors. I thank you, Mr. Chairman. I yield my time.

WALDEN: The gentleman's time has expired, and has yielded back. The chair now recognizes the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Shimkus for five minutes.

SHIMKUS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and Chairman Wheeler, welcome. I'm going to try to get through three pretty quick points if I can. As you know, there's a lot of concerns on this side of the dials (ph) and this Title II debate ...

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

SHIMKUS: ... and -- and the basic premise is how do you -- for me, is how do you build out? You want -- we want more, not less. Does a regulated monopoly incentivize more build out, more pipelines, or does a competitive, capital-intensive, incentivized, market-driven process?

I believe the second. So that's -- we've gone from copper, to cable -- collective (ph) cable, satellite, cellular, fiber, a lot of different ways for data to now flow. And we want to encourage that.

And I don't -- I think only -- I kind of like the idea of incentivizing people who want to use more, making them pay more, to incentivize those who carry, someone may want to build out more. That's kind of where I come from. My position is more pipes, not less, more pipes not regulated pipe, competitive markets versus controlled markets.

So because here's an example of that -- a recent -- on May 16th, the Wireline Competition Bureau released a public notice seeking comment on state regulation of dial-up internet traffic. Dial-up. I mean that's a dinosaur. It's hardly used.

So there's -- there is no -- you want to talk about uncertainty for the state and for the providers, when we're still in this process, more than 15 years after the SEC first discussed the treatment of dial-up, we're -- we're now to this process? So that's just kind of a statement. That doesn't create certainty. Would you -- would you agree?

WHEELER: Well what we're trying to do, Mr. Shimkus, is to -- is to create an environment that assures consumers and those who rely on the internet that there is openness, while at the same point in time, encouraging investment.

SHIMKUS: Well let's just go back. I get that, but does that -- this is dial-up.

WHEELER: We still -- so if we're dealing with the dial-up -- I mean that's really -- that's a -- that's a different topic ...

SHIMKUS: Well it is, but it's not, because it's -- it's the whole debate about certainty, and if -- we actually have a dinosaur application, then why are we even ...

WHEELER: So we still have 40 percent of our consumers on dial-up telephone lines. One of the challenges that we have is how do we evolve that into an all IP environment, which would be, you know, an internet-like environment.

And one of the things that I have -- I have said to this committee is that we believe that this IP transition is a crucial part in how do we ...

SHIMKUS: OK, I get it, I'm going to try to (inaudible) ...

WHEELER: OK, sorry, sir.

SHIMKUS: In one deals in both of our sweet spot is kind of the public service, 9-11, the spectromac (ph) call for the creation of the do not call registry, and the automatic dialing issue. The commission keeps saying there's not enough money to do this.

I would ask you to check into that. I think there's a lot of money in the FCC. And because obviously this automatic dialing freezes up lines, and it's a public safety concern, and I would hope that we would work together to try to -- you would take that into consideration.

WHEELER: I would take a look forward to that. Let me -- let me get back, and I will come to ...

SHIMKUS: And you know, myself and the ranking member have been better (ph) involved in this issue, as you have in -- in the early days also. The last thing I want to -- from rural America, is kind of just there seems to be a de facto freeze on this shared service agreement.

And this isn't a broadcast sector, as you know. The local -- when you represent a third of the state of Illinois, as I do now, 33 counties, these shared agreements are now helping to provide, and we've got real-world cases, better local service to the local folks, than -- than less.

And I guess the basic question in my last minute is what's your plan to ensure that FDAC (ph) action on television transfer application is predictable, consistent, fair, and timely?

WHEELER: So -- thank you, Mr. Shimkus. What we -- what we have done, is to put out a public notice on how we look at transfers. And I consider this to be a procedural reform. Because the way it used to be, was broadcasters would -- would -- would come together in some kind of a -- a -- a merger situation, and they would come to the commission, which was a black box, that had constantly changing, well, this we'll look at it this way, we'll look at it that way.

And what I wanted to do was to say OK, what are the things that we will look at? So that everybody has notice, everybody understands, and it is not a black box. And that's the process that we have now established to be able to make those kinds of decisions.

SHIMKUS: Thank you. I know my time has expired. I appreciate it if you'd keep me in mind as these things move forward, it would be helpful.

WHEELER: Yes, sir. Thank you.

WALDEN: The chair now recognizes the gentlelady from Colorado, Ms. DeGette, for five minutes.

DEGETTE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I want to follow up, Chairman Wheeler, on this discussion about the open internet NPRM (ph). Leading up to the commission's vote last week, there was a robust public exchange among ISPs, and edge (ph) providers, and others, about the impact of paid prioritization on their business models. And as Ms. Matsui said, we've been hearing from a lot of our constituents about this as well.

Now you talked very briefly about -- a few minutes ago, about what the FCC is doing in its review process to look at the effect of paid prioritization on consumers' broadband bills. Wondering if you can comment about what you think the proposed open internet rules will have on access to new and innovative content online. Because that's one reason why we're concerned about these proposed rules.

WHEELER: The -- it should be encouragement of new and innovative programming, because of the fact that it assures that they will be able to reach the consumer, unfettered, and without having to pay special fees.

DEGETTE: And what impact do you think that the rules will have on average broadband speeds, network investments, and overall quality of service?

WHEELER: That's a terrific question ...

DEGETTE: Thank you.

WHEELER: ... I'm glad you asked it. You know, one of the fascinating things is that 2010, when the open internet rules were first proposed, since then, there has been hundreds of millions of dollars of broadband investment made. So the rules don't seem to have a chilling effect. And, speeds have been doing this, going up. And this is what the court was talking about when they talk about this virtuous cycle because everything -- in the internet ecosystem everything adds to everything else.

DEGETTE: So what do you think that the new rules, what effect will they have on these issues?

WHEELER: I believe ...

DEGETTE: You just talked about what's been happening...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: Yes, we believe that the rules that we have designed will continue to encourage investment in broadband, continue to encourage increases in throughput and as a result continue to encourage innovation from edge providers.

DEGETTE: And so are you saying also that average broadband speeds will increase?

WHEELER: Yes ma'am.

DEGETTE: And overall quality of service will increase?

WHEELER: Yes ma'am, they'll need to.

DEGETTE: All right. OK, one last thing no one has raised yet, is the issue of industry consolidation. And this year we've seen two major merger proposals in the telecom industry. Now clearly the industry's going through a period of significant technological and economic change. And some folks think that consolidation is the best approach to this. So all things being equal, do you think industry consolidation is good or bad for the consumers?

WHEELER: So, I read the other day that we are probably the -- in the last decade the biggest year for telecom mergers and what we're doing is opening a record on each of them. And we'll make that decision based on the record that is developed for each...

DEGETTE: ...So you don't have an opinion at this point?

WHEELER: I don't want to prejudge the record.

DEGETTE: OK. And as you know congress has recognized the importance and unique character of the telecommunications marketplace by giving the FCC the authority to review mergers under the public interest standard. Do you think the conditions the FCC placed on the Comcast/NBCU merger were effective at promoting the public interest?

WHEELER: Oh, wow, you know, that is something that -- a decision that my predecessor made. I know that it had impact. My goal is to look at the record that we have presented before me and my colleagues and make a decision on those.

DEGETTE: Do you think it promoted the public interest? Yes or no.

WHEELER: I think that there were multiple things in it that promoted the public interest.

DEGETTE: And what other lessons do you take away from commissions previous attempts to promote the public interests by placing conditions on mergers as you go forward?

WHEELER: That it is an important role that the commission has. You know, there is a lot of discussion as to why should there be any authority of the FCC to look at public interest obligations.

DEGETTE: Right.

WHEELER: I strongly believe that there is a big difference between the kind of statutory rigidity that the justice department is required to look at mergers with and the kind of broader public interest issues that you've raised that the statute asked the FCC to look at.

DEGETTE: Chairman, I just asked if you could supplement your testimony with some specific takeaways that this has given you. Thank you very much. Thanks Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: Gentlady yields back. The chair now recognizes -- I'm sorry the chair recognizes the Chairman.

(UNKNOWN): I just wanted to clarify one thing to make sure I heard it right. Did you say 40 percent of Americans are still using dial-up for internet access?

WHEELER: No, I'm talking about dial-up phone service writ large.

(UNKNOWN): OK because I was saying it's more like 3 percent.

WHEELER: No, dial-up phone service writ large.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you. And I thank the courtesy of the chair.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you for clarifying that, sir.

WALDEN: Thank you.

The chair now recognizes the gentleman from Nebraska for five minutes Mr. Terry.

TERRY: Thank you. It's good to know that my 82-year-old father is in the 3 percent, that makes him very elite. I'm trying to talk him out of that, but that's a...

(CROSSTALK).

WHEELER: I remember the days when we were thrilled to get 56kb, right?

TERRY: Yes.

So switching gears just a little bit. I wanna ask about quintile (ph) aggression analysis progress and I do think that you have probably captured its deficiencies better than anyone else has and I appreciate that work. I was glad to see the commission's follow-up by repealing the QRA formula.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

TERRY: So congratulations, I appreciate that. I'm curious on your thoughts of how it should be replaced and if you could walk me through what factors are going to be used in any decision making and time tables and process.

WHEELER: I respect the question, but I can't really answer it right now because we're in the process of -- there's several proposals and we're in the process of looking at what the best components of each are. And I don't want to hip shoot here, but we do have proceedings underway to say, OK, what is it we will replace QRA with?

TERRY: So, where are we within the process of those?

WHEELER: I think that we're probably heading into something that you would see before fall.

TERRY: Before fall?

(UNKNOWN): Early fall, football season.

TERRY: Well, I don't want to get distracted.

WHEELER: Well if you joined the big team.

TERRY: Do that when we McNeese State and I would appreciate that.

WHEELER: Yes sir.

TERRY: For the rest of you, that was humor. Now then let me go to a broadcast question since we succinctly dealt with one I thought would take all of five minutes. The spectrum deal that was authorized in incentive auctions and passed through the committee was a bipartisan bill and unfortunately the order removed the FCC was not bipartisan. And some commissioners, particularly republicans, stated that the order treats (ph) TV broadcasters that choose not to participate in the auctions unfairly and that has me concerned.

Congress set aside the 1.75 to reimburse broadcasters for us to move part of the incentive option in the range to fully recover their expenses. Why did the FCC not adopt the number as its repacking budget and ensure that broadcasters would not have to go out of pocket when forced to the FCC to move?

WHEELER: Thank you. Congress said a billion 750 million is the max that can be spent on repacking. We think that will be sufficient. There have been broadcasters who have expressed a concern that it might not be sufficient. So we have said, OK, we don't think that's going to happen, but we will put in place a process that will have a structure in place if and when that should happen. Sir, I don't expect that we're going to get there.

TERRY: All right. I'll just yield back my time. Thank you, sir.

WHEELER: The gentleman yields back and the chair now recognizes the gentleman from Utah, Mr. Matheson for five minutes.

MATHESON: Thanks Mr. Chairman and Mr. Wheeler thanks for your testimony. I appreciate your candor and your articulate way you answer questions.

WHEELER: Thank you, sir.

MATHESON: I also want to commend you on your efforts to open up more spectrum for our license uses. The FCC took an important step last month by opening up the 100 gigahertz for spectrum for unlicensed uses in the 5 gigahertz band and I'm pleased to see in your testimony that the FCC is actively participating in an ongoing effort to free up additional unlicensed spectrum in the 5 gigahertz band. Can you provide an update on where things currently stand with resolving the technical issues in the ITS band currently used for vehicle-to-vehicle communications and the parts of the band used by the DOD for military radar?

WHEELER: Yes. So, as we talked, there's three slices to 5 gigahertz.

MATHESON: Right.

WHEELER: There's lower slice that we took care of. The middle, as you suggest, is DOD. We are having ongoing discussions with them. I have been personally involved in those discussions about a wide range of spectrum issues including this. There are strongly held beliefs on both sides, sir. I continue to believe, however, that people of good faith can find answers if you sit at the table long enough, and that's the goal.

And so far as the high band in 5 gig, yes, that's intelligent transportation, which offers such great opportunities with Google Smart Card and all this sort of thing. The thing that's really encouraging is that that's an 802 type of standard. It's not a dissimilar reality, however. Where we need to make sure that people are sitting around the table looking for commonalities rather than looking for differences.

MATHESON: Something we got to do around congress a little.

WHEELER: You have a little experience.

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: But that's the goal of what we're trying to do here.

MATHESON: Do you have a sense of what the -- do you have a timeframe for when this additional spectrum could be freed up?

WHEELER: I wish I did. I would be misleading you, sir, if I gave you a date right now.

MATHESON: I understand. Another issue I wanted to mention. The administrations ConnectED program, the goal to bring 100 megabit broadband to every school in the US. To the extent that this initiative is implemented through the ERAY (ph) program, what can the commission do to maximize efficiency and get the most bang for their buck?

WHEELER: Wow, thank you. Great question. There are multiple challenges in that. One is that we need to spend our money, the people's money, on 21st Century high-speed broadband solutions not 20th century solutions like dial-up telephone service and a long distance. Right now about half of the $2 billion, $2.4 billion that's being spent is spent for old stuff. Not today, half today (ph). Second part is that we have to design a system that helps schools and library administrators find their way through the maze that is telecom.

I mean, we put them in those jobs to educate students, not to be telecom wizzes. So we're trying to develop a process that says, you know, here's what you ought to be paying. Here's what somebody next door is paying. Here's like situated, so that they can go in and understand where they're bargaining positioning is.

We're going to be talking about being able to have longer contracts because buying it on a monthly basis, as we all know, is the worst way to buy. So let's talk about several years. We're going to be encouraging concertia (ph) so that you can buy in bulk and get better prices. And I just think that there are a myriad of things that we can do to get more efficiency out of the existing bucks, and we intend to do that.

MATHESON: That's great. Does the FCC plan on using the national broadband map to identify fiber that is already in place in a given community so it can be leveraged toward these ConnectED (ph) goal?

WHEELER: Absolutely and we have now taken over the ownership of the broadband map, so yes, sir.

MATHESON: OK, I appreciate that. I will yield back, Mr. Chairman.

WHEELER: Thank you very much. The gentleman yields back balance of time and the chair now recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. Lance for five minutes.

LANCE: Thank you very much and good afternoon to you. I believe that some of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle would prefer a title 2 reclassification. And if the commission were to decide to proceed in that direction, I'm concerned that it might trigger a lot of ill-fitting regulations that might not make sense in the context of these services. In your opinion, Chairman, would the process of going through forbearance to separate the wheat from the chaff, could it be a messy exercise and might it lead to more years of litigation and uncertainty is my real concern, sir?

WHEELER: Thank you, Congressman. That's one of the things that gets teed up in the imperium (ph) when we ask about title 2 versus section 706. And I presume that that will be exhaustively discussed in the responses. And that's exactly the kind of questions that we're asking.

LANCE: Thank you. One concern has been raised about the proposed net totality rule making process protections that would be afforded companies use a carrier that's providing the same service as another carrier. For example, the large carriers are beginning to bundle services that go well beyond phone service, the internet and television, to include smart phone services such as temperature control, home health monitoring, which of course is important to another subcommittee of this committee, as well as alarm services such as monitoring of home intrusions and fires, video surveillance or personal emerge response systems. What protections will the FCC provide to ensure that the carrier does not give its service provider a preference over a company using them as a broad-based carrier?

WHEELER: I'm not sure I exactly understand. What your concern is will there be preferences among providers of those services?

LANCE: Yes, Chairman.

WHEELER: That's contrary to the concept of an open internet.

LANCE: So, you can assure us as the American people that that will not be the case as these other services are provided moving forward?

WHEELER: Let me give you an example personally.

LANCE: Yes, sir.

WHEELER: I just switched out ADT in my home security system for another company. And I was able to access both of them over the internet and both of them over my mobile device and there should be no interference with my ability to move from ADT to the other provider.

LANCE: Thank you, and that's the goal of the commission and you will assure us that that is how you will proceed moving forward?

WHEELER: There needs to be open access for all providers.

LANCE: Thank you. I look forward to working with you. I understand you're a proud graduate of Ohio State, is that?

WHEELER: You bet, yes, sir.

LANCE: Please be gentle with Rutgers now that Rutgers has entered the big, whatever it is, the big 16 or whatever it is.

WHEELER: It's the big 10 that can't count.

LANCE: The big 10 that can't count. I defer back to the Chairman the balance of my time, a proud representative from Ohio.

WHEELER: Well thank you very much. For the gentlemen yielding back his balance of his time. The chair now recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. Butterfield for 5 minutes.

BUTTERFIELD: Thank you very much gentlemen for yielding time and thank you to you Chairman for your service and thank you for your testimony today. I especially thank you for your clarity. I told you that the first time that I met you and whenever I hear you speak it is unambiguous. At least until the subject of your home security system comes up and you are a little ambiguous with who the new provider is but thank you so very much.

Mr. Chairman in the communications act congress mandated that the commission ensured diverse participation in media and telecom and that includes participation in minority and women own businesses. The quote from the statue basically says that the mandate is to promote economic opportunity and competition by disseminating licenses among a wide variety of applicants including small businesses, rural telecoms and businesses owned by members of minority groups and women. End of quote.

It seems to me that the response of the commission to judicial criticism of the FCCs inaction in this area and the lack of meaningful study and progress as well as the low level of minority of women on participation and media and telecom licensing that the commission seems to me is not committed to these diversity goals. And if I am wrong about this, I would ask that you correct me.

On May the 14th, members of the congressional black caucus including Congressman Rush and myself addressed these concerns -- these diversity concerns in a letter to you. I suppose the letter may not have made its way to your desk yet, but I ask that you look at it very carefully when you do. Question, what precisely do you need beyond the congressional directions and judicial criticism to get the commission to make progress in creating opportunities for diverse communities.

WHEELER: Thank you, Congressman, and I got the letter this morning, so thank you. First of all, I agree that we have a mandate to have a broad swath of opportunity for all Americans to participate in all aspects of telecommunications. I can assure you that that's a goal of mine. Now let's talk about some specifics.

Number one, I think what we did on the JSAs in the broadcast space actually opens up opportunities for minority and small operators. That's why it was supported by more than a dozen representative minority groups. Secondly is, we are going to move on the AWS3 (ph) auction to make sure that there are appropriate steps taken to assure that minorities can participate through waivers in other kinds of processes in that auction. Thirdly, we are going to have -- and I should pause and in all of these call out Commissioner Clyburn, who has been the constant pusher on all of these issues.

There will be designated envy rules for the incentive auction that will create bidding credits for appropriate designated entities. And I very much take to heart both as an institutional responsibility and as a personal responsibility the language that you read.

BUTTERFIELD: And so when the spectrum is auctioned you are making a commitment that diversity will be an overriding concern of the commission?

WHEELER: What we want to do is make sure that there are opportunities for designated entities to get bidding credits to that, for instance, they can bid with 75 cent dollars against AT&T and Verizon's 100 cent dollars.

BUTTERFIELD: Let me get this last one in if I can. In light of the demographic changes of caring in our country and the growing numbers of mergers in the communications industry, how is the commission encouraging companies to partner with diverse businesses in the secondary market?

WHEELER: We have been doing that in both formally and informally, that there are great opportunities when there are transactions for minority companies. They, you know, grain telecom comes to mind, which is now operating spectrum I believe for both AT&T and Verizon, which they purchased as a part of some settlements with the commission. And those kind of opportunities are important and worthwhile. I also believe that there can be new opportunities in the broadcast space particularly after the auction in terms of being able to share spectrum and offer other kinds of services.

BUTTERFIELD: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WHEELER: Thank you very much. The chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Guthrie.

GUTHRIE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you for coming today. I know you had a busy week so your time is appreciated. My colleague from California Ms. Matsui have spent a lot of time on spectrum issues and we've founded a congressional spectrum caucus and -- and looking for different ideas on how we can move forward on that spectrum.

And I appreciate the efforts that you've done to move the incentive auction forward. And have a couple of questions about the guard bands and the 680 megahertz band. It appears to me that the band plan for spectrum cleared in the broadcast incentive auction carefully considered the importance of maximizing license spectrum and adhered to the technically reasonable standards set by congress for creating a duplex gap. And I applaud the commission for this area in this regard. Quick two questions, one how do you foresee going forward with unlicensed spectrum in the duplex gap? As you know it would be important for those who bid on adjacent license spectrum to have as sure there will not be interference and are you confident the FCC will have technical guidelines to have assurance for those who bid for license spectrum there will be no interference in the duplex gap from our lines (ph)?

WHEELER: Yes, sir. The answer to both you just identified technical standards. And so for instance we're going to have technical standards proceeding for wireless mics and others who would be using the unlicensed spectrums, so yes, sir.

GUTHRIE: OK, and we've been using social media to reach out to interest Americans and so we're here for representing the American people and one came from Kelly on Facebook and Kelly asked this question -- well Kelly submitted this question through Facebook who would like to ask the question about your plans for future spectrum policy and can you give Kelly a brief answer to her question about why just broadly future spectrum policy?

WHEELER: Thank you Kelly. The answer is that, you know, they're not making it no more and so what we have to do -- I believe that we are today on the cusp of the new Verizon on spectrum policy with two things that we are doing. One is the incentive auction that you all created. Because when you boil everything down it ultimately comes to economics. And if you can address the other person's economics you can probably go along with solving your economics issue. And that's what the auction does.

The other component is spectrum sharing. And the days of hearing this is all yours who uses it are over and fortunately digital allows that kind of sharing. You know, think about going into a Starbucks and everybody is sharing that Wi-Fi spectrum. You put those two together and that's I think the answer to Kelly's question as to where is spectrum policy going. And we're in the middle of making both of those work right now, which is why what we're doing is so terribly important.

GUTHRIE: Yes, I often use the metaphor there's a very simple metaphor compared to a complex physics in this, but we don't have special highways for ambulances or fire trucks, we get out of the way when they need to go down the highway. So sharing that's kind of a simple way to look at the metaphor. There's in one of your statements and I'm putting my hate as a former state legislature so I was the Senator in Kentucky before here and there's been some concerns of places like Utah and Oregon where there's been municipal broadband deployed and the project have failed and there's (ph) were their competitive providers and these projects have resulted in putting millions of dollars in municipal bonds, property taxes, selling franchise taxes at risk and I believe the I probo (ph) sold to Google for a dollar and leaving city tax payers on the hook repaying tens of millions of dollars.

My understanding is five states or so have passed laws saying that cities can't do this -- because the states usually something happens to the city the states kind of on the hook for it as well and I believe in your prepared your written testimony you said that you believe the FCC could do perimption (ph) over this area in the state law and I just wanted you to clarify that. And why you think Washington could have a better view of this than Frankfurt, for example, in Kentucky.

WHEELER: So there are about 20 states that have put some kind of restrictions in place. And I see it through just exactly the opposite end of the telescope with all due respect, that if the citizens of a community want to organize through their local government to say to bring competition in broadband provision, they should not be inhibited.

GUTHRIE: No. They inhibit it by their elected...

WHEELER: They should not be inhibited by the fact that the incumbents have been urging the adoption of legislation that would ban it. And if we believe in competition, we ought to let competition flourished.

So what I have said is that I'm following again Judge Silverman's comments in his dissent nonetheless in the open internet case in which he said, "If there's ever an example where 706 would apply, it is in the ability to -- to say the States, 'You cannot get in the middle of this virtuous cycle and prohibit consumers from being able to have access to a competitive service'".

GUTHRIE: So -- so your perception is that government should be doing that because of the incumbents or because they don't want to be on the hook for an I-provoke-type situation.

WHEELER: So the -- I go back to first principles with -- that is this is a decision that ought to be made by the people of the community. And that that if they want to take the risk, if they own it themselves, but you don't have to own it yourself.

It is also -- the gentleman from Utah has left. But for instance in Utah, there's a group of cities that have banded together to -- to solicit bids for somebody else to own that they would have a participation in.

That kind of structure -- if the people say that's what we want; this -- we want this kind of competition, then I think they ought to be encouraged together. And competition has clearly been shown to be the best tool.

GUTHRIE: Well, I don't disagree with you on that. But my time actually has expired. I know that Chairman's ready to gobble me down, so I yield back. Thank you.

WALDEN: Thank you very much. The -- the Chairman would never do that to the gentleman from Kentucky. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Vermont, Mr. Welch.

WELCH: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Wheeler, I have five questions. We have five minutes so we can go look at this split.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

WELCH: First thing, Bob Latta and I started the Rural Caucus. We so appreciated you coming an enormous concern in rural America that we get access to the internet. It's essential for our future. That neutrality is a big deal. That's the big topic. You've been getting comments.

There's an enormous amount of concern that if we make the wrong decision, the big guys are gonna get the fast lane, the little guys - many in rural America are gonna get the breakdown lane.

Can you give us some reassurance that at the end of this process, we're gonna have access, on equal terms, for folks in rural America to the internet?

WHEELER: You want a quick answer? Yes.

WELCH: Yes.

WHEELER: Yes.

WELCH: And that's a full sentence. You can give a full sentence to reassure all of us especially rural America...

WHEELER: There should...

WELCH: That we're gonna be driving in the fast lane.

WHEELER: There should not -- there is one internet. There is not a fast internet; there is not a slow internet. There is not an urban internet; there is not a rural internet. There is one internet. Everybody ought to have open equal access to the capacity delivered by the internet.

WELCH: Okay. Thank you. Now, getting the internet, rural America is spread out, and the investors want to put their money where they can make the money. We all understand that. That was true for electricity. But we've got to get that internet out into rural America so we can be part of the modern economy.

And we have a Universal Service Fund with the -- with the Mobility Fund, whereas we need to have that. And I'm wondering if you could comment on the status of that and what we need to do to make sure that the funds are there to build out that broadband.

WHEELER: Specifically on the Mobility. Here's the interesting question that gets raised by Mobility. Broadband wireless is LTE. It is being built out across America. Recently just one of the major carriers announced a new initiative in rural America with LTE.

The question becomes, that we're wrestling with, is should we subsidize something if it's already happening? And that prudent fiscal responsibilities suggest probably not.

WELCH: Well, I got three more questions.

WHEELER: OK.

WELCH: So we wanna work with you on that to make it rational and not have us investing on things that aren't working but invest in things that are going to help rural America gets the best.

WHEELER: That's true. That's -- that's what we're trying to get to.

WELCH: All right. Third, we've got to work with you and your entire Commission, the Republicans and the Democrats. And when you came into our rural working group, you explained a couple of problems you had each in IT and also procedures where I guess it's easier to hire a lawyer...

WHEELER: Yeah.

WELCH: Than an engineer.

WHEELER: Yes.

WELCH: I'm a lawyer so maybe I'd like that, but I wouldn't be very much use to you. What are the things that this committee can advocate to help your entire Commission, Rs&Ds who want to do the job so you have the tools you need to do it?

WHEELER: Thank you for asking. Our IT infrastructure is worthy of this Masonian. I came from a business background. The things that you cannot do is -- that are common sense in the business world. The fact that we're still using computers that have known cyber risks associated with them. The fact that we can't organize a consumer complaint process online for American consumers because our IT system isn't up to us -- up to it is ridiculous.

So, we have serious problems there on the issue of lawyers versus engineers. Far be it for me to take a side on that but we do need more engineers, sir.

WELCH: OK. Thank you.

WHEELER: And economists.

WELCH: Right.

WHEELER: And economists.

WELCH: Well, I'd like our committee to work with you on that. Next, Section 706. There's a lot of concern about whether you have the sufficient authority under that section in order to give you the rulemaking power to guarantee the outcome being net neutrality. Can you comment on that? Do you still feel that that is sufficient and the court gave you a roadmap forward?

WHEELER: I think -- I think that we do have sufficient authority and then when the court talked about this virtuous cycle and they said, "Anything that interferers with that virtuous cycle is a violation of 706", that that is a very broad grant of authority.

WELCH: OK. My last question in 26 seconds. Retrans consent and blocking online content, we've seen that in the broadcast area where there's a dispute and people can't get access to the signal. Now, that's starting to migrate into the online content. Is this the beginning of the cabalization of the internet?

WHEELER: Sir, I think it is the right question. Our authority goes to the -- retransmission and program access goes to the authority of good faith negotiations. I think there is reason to be concerned when because I happen to subscribe to an ISP who is in a dispute with a program provider. That the program provider blocks all access from all IP addresses coming from that ISP. I think that is something that is -- is -- is of concern and that we all should worry about.

WELCH: Okay. I yield back. Thank you very much, Mr. Wheeler.

WHEELER: Thank you, sir.

WALDEN: Thank you very much. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. Pompeo.

POMPEO: Thank you, Mr. WALDEN: Thank you for being here today. I don't want to spend a lot of time on net neutrality. We have different view. I view it is nothing more than a price control. I think we've seen how that works in creating supply. And so I think -- I think it's a very dangerous path that you're headed down.

I do want to ask a couple of process questions related to that. Have you spoken to anyone at the White House or OMB in the last month regarding net neutrality?

WHEELER: Only to keep them appraised. They have been assiduous in their recognition that we are an independent agency.

POMPEO: And did you call them or did they call you?

WHEELER: I called them.

POMPEO: And has anyone else on your staff spoken to folks at the White House or OMB in the last month?

WHEELER: Not in my...

POMPEO: With this issue?

WHEELER: Well, on -- the answer is I'm sure. On -- on this issue, I don't know but I can assure you from my discussions with everybody, from the President on down, the recognition of the independence of our agency; and I'll go further and assure you that never have I or to my knowledge anyone of my staff felt any pressure to decide any issue.

POMPEO: I appreciate that. Thank you. I want to follow-up on something. Representative Guthrie was saying you believe the FCC has the power to preempt state law to ban competition from community broadband.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

POMPEO: Under Section 706.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

POMPEO: Do you believe that State have the same authority.

WHEELER: I think that's the -- the issue that I believe is do we have the authority to preempt. That raises the question of what is the authority of the State. And I think that we have preempt authority. I think we'll probably end up having this answered in court.

POMPEO: Wait, look. I -- I just read the statute that they have the same authority that the -- the FCC does. The language is identical. It says you would have authority as you have in that.

WHEELER: Well, it says State Commissions.

POMPEO: Right.

WHEELER: If you will. Yes. And -- and it says that we have -- we have preemptory authority over State Commissions.

POMPEO: So State Commissions have the same authority that you do. Do you agree with that?

WHEELER: Don't I?

POMPEO: That's a simple statute, I mean it says the same thing I just said.

WHEELER: No I think that I -- I think that it says that that -- that both of us have authority, but that we have preemptory authority on this issue. And I think that's what Judge Silverman was saying in his dissent in that Verizon...

POMPEO: Great. Not all dissent. Chairman, will the FCC's Media Bureau recently issued new, they call them "Processing Guidelines for Broadcast Transactions"; and this broadcast talks not only about future broadcast transactions but also pending applications. I have three questions with respect to that.

First, how many applications have been singled out for a closed scrutiny since that new guidelines have been issued? How many have been approved in those two months? And when might those broadcasters see the resolution of their applications?

WHEELER: I don't know the answer to any of -- of those three for the -- off top of my head. But I'll be happy to get it for -- get it for you for the record.

POMPEO: OK. You can understand these are pending applications submitted under the set of rules. You've now moved the goalpost on them. This is -- this is...

WHEELER: No, actually, I -- yes, sir, I understand your point. What we're trying to do is not move the goalpost but to open up the process so that everybody knows...

POMPEO: But that's what you did.

WHEELER: ...what the rules are.

POMPEO: But that's what you did. I mean you changed -- you changed the rules with respect to applications already submitted under preexisting set of standards. So, and I don't know how you could describe that as anything but moving the goalpost.

WHEELER: With all respect, sir. We had -- we had a series of transactions that were in placed. And in the decisions on those transactions, we said, note, "Going forward, there will be a new look at what financial structures are in transactions", not in these transactions that we're approving.

Then we put out a public notice that said, "Here is how we are going to open up this black box and here is what is gonna be going on." And it is that standard. So there was -- there was notice as a part of a decision that was not affected. Then there was notice through a public notice. And now those that they -- the Bureau is reviewing are subject to both of those.

POMPEO: And my last 20 seconds. And with net neutrality, there are also cyber security issues. Do you plan to explicitly give network providers liability protections in their efforts to protect their network from cyber security as part of your rulemaking and --for net neutrality.

WHEELER: It was not considered as a part of the rulemaking to have -- have that.

POMPEO: All right. Mr. Chairman, I yield back my time.

WALDEN: Thank you very much. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Mexico, Mr. Lujan.

LUJAN: Mr. Chairman, thank you very much. Chairman, we thank you so much...

WHEELER: Mr. Lujan.

LUJAN: ...for being here as well. Chairman Wheeler, two weeks ago, this committee added my amendment calling on the FCC to conduct a study on reforming the designated market area system to the STELA Reauthorization Bill.

As you know, DMAs are currently defined by a map drawn by Nielsen, a for-profit marketing research company based upon the reach of television broadcast antennas. This kind of work of antennas is based upon technology deployed back in the '40s and '50s. Americans could have a multitude of viewing options via technology such as cable, broadband and wireless internet. But current DMA rules prevent the viewership of much of that content.

I believe that a system embraced by these technologies could revitalize television broadcasting with new affiliates reaching viewers who have more in common than their placement on Nielsen's old map.

It is my hope that the Commission takes this study seriously and bring the policy into the 21st century, Mr. Chairman. So I hope that we might be able to work...

WHEELER: Thank you for your leadership on this, Mr. Lujan. And that I assure you that we will take it seriously.

LUJAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And Mr. Chairman, it wasn't too long ago that a company would not allow access to another companies upside. There was a question a few years ago with AT&T and FaceTime, an Apple product.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

LUJAN: As I talked about fixed versus mobile. They defended it by saying it was allowed under the FCC's net neutrality rules granted this was under 3G.

Section 62 of the proposal suggests no -- no blocking rule -- that sorry, the no blocking rule was applied to different standard to mobile broadband internet access and mobile internet access service was excluded from the unreasonable discrimination rules. We're seeing mobile getting fast -- faster now and with the new spectrum options, even faster than fixed.

I appreciate and I agree with you that we're talking about one internet with open and equal access. With my colleagues in rural areas, I shared with you before that there's a conversation about taking phone calls and with bandwidth capabilities as well as streaming of content on airplanes. In rural America, we should be able to get the same treatment. I do not understand why we're not there yet. But nonetheless, it's common.

So I'm hopeful that as we have this conversation that we're able to have equitable treatment. I know that there is a, as I read in the proposal, that there is elements of asking for a look into this...

WHEELER: Right.

LUJAN: ... in the rule. But I'm certainly hopeful that this will be treated with the same scrutiny and level of attention. And again, as I talk about an old antiquated rule within the '40s and '50s, we talked about dial-up, that this is another area that we're going to have equitable treatment as well especially with new gigabit access as well.

Mr. Chairman, in another area, I know that there's a number of my colleagues who join me in their concern for recent reports of interconnection deals particularly the one between Comcast and Netflix. You stated that peering is not a net neutrality issue, there is a matter of the -- that there is a matter of the open internet and there is a matter of the internet connection among the various disparate pathways that become the internet.

Well, I understand that net neutrality refers only to the behavior of internet service providers blocking or throttling the speeds of certain websites. My question is how is an interconnection agreement that essentially throttles content substantially different?

WHEELER: So, thank you. So that's -- that's a very good question. They -- you can -- you can think of the internet in -- in three parts. There is the -- well, actually four parts. There is somebody like Netflix getting on the internet and then writing so- called middle mile providers to a peering point which is just a fancy word for interconnection where they then have access to Comcast Verizon, whoever the case maybe.

The consumer buys from their computer up to the peering point. Traditionally, peering has been I'll take mine, you take yours, back and forth kind of a thing; and -- and -- and for free. That has begun to change overtime.

LUJAN: If I may apologize, my time has been elapsed, so maybe what I'll do is if we could get that into the record. All that I would add is once upon a time peering agreements didn't have an exchange of money. People find a way to...

WHEELER: Exactly right.

LUJAN: ...each other. And I'm hoping that we can get some certainty with the treatment of fixed versus mobile in that area. And lastly, I -- I'd like for the record if there's any way that you might be able to provide us more specifics and details with what's been talked about as commercially reasonable...

WHEELER: Good.

LUJAN: ...as well as we talk about now pretty smaller companies have disadvantages. I apologize again, Mr. Chairman. I could always sit and visit with you. And the last thing that I would say is President Obama isn't in support of an open internet and I would encourage you to speak with him. So thank you very much for that as well.

WHEELER: Let me just -- Congressman, so am I.

WALDEN: Thank you. Thank you very much. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. Scalise.

SCALISE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman for having the hearing and thank you Commissioner Wheeler for being here today and answering our questions. And there was -- as we look at the potential changes that have been proposed, a lot of us that want to continue to maintain a free and open internet want to make sure that we're going about it the right way. I know you've got some concerns with the fact that the FCC would even consider going to Title II route in terms of reclassifying broadband, you know.

And a lot of us had reached out for our constituents to -- to have them also give us suggestions on things that they would like to ask you as well. And a lot of the -- the comments that we got I know that I got in my district were just concerns about maintaining that open internet, and keeping the government out of regulating it, and -- and trying to make sure that the government doesn't impede the ability for the innovations that we've seen which have been so dramatic and revolutionized to not only the country, but revolutionized the entire world. And it's a lot of innovation that -- that's made in America. And we want to continue to see that innovation thrive.

When you -- when you look at going into the reclassification, and there's a proposal that's out there. I know, like I said, I've got concerns about that. But in your written statement, you assert that the private sector must play the leading role in extending broadband networks to every American. That if it were to be reclassified under Title II, who -- who would pay for extending those networks if they're subject to common carrier regulations.

WHEELER: Private sector.

SCALISE: But then when you look at the -- the Title II route, would the FCC have the authority to regulate broadband pricing?

WHEELER: So in the vastness of Title II, that is conceivable. One of the reasons that we are asking for Title II versus Section 706 comments in this proceeding is to be able to specifically zero-in on what are issues such as that. What are the...

SCALISE: So you think you may have the ability to regulate broadband pricing, is that something you -- you think could be an open...

WHEELER: Now, let's...

SCALISE: ...possibility for the FCC?

WHEELER: Should a full Title II regime be chosen, which should has not been, we are proposing...

SCALISE: But you're making the proposals.

WHEELER: ...Section 706.

SCALISE: Right.

WHEELER: No, we're -- we're -- no we're not. What we're doing is we're proposing Section 706 as the approach and then we've asked questions about Title II. And these are the kinds of issues that come up -- will come up in that discussion and that are gonna warrant...

SCALISE: But if -- if you'd in them telecommunication services. You know, because that puts broadband into a different realm than it is today. It's not there right now. If you do choose to try to put it there. Which state public utility in the -- in our State. We've got a public service commission. Would those state public service commissions and other related entities in the States be able to -- to regulate broadband at that point?

WHEELER: So what we have proposed is not Title II, it's Section 706. What we have asked is for a discussion of Title II and those kinds of issues. But our proposal for which I've taken a lot of heat is not Title II. I've said...

SCALISE: We don't have to go forward with the proposal.

WHEELER: I've said -- I've said...

SCALISE: So you stop taking the heat right now and...

WHEELER: No, I've said -- I've said that we're -- I said that Title II was on the table. That we're willing to look at Title II. But -- and -- and Mr. Waxman has a specific proposal where he thinks that Title II ought to be a backup and that's a proposal that is important and worth considering. But the proposal that we made is Section 706.

SCALISE: Let me ask you this because you're also -- it seems like a one-way street where you're just targeting this towards internet service providers. I mean there are a lot of content carriers out there too, content providers that, you know, a lot of members have used the Netflix example or, you know, Google and other content providers that also have a play in this realm that that you just seem to be targeting this towards internet service providers.

And so I'm not sure if there's some -- some acts to grind there, but it just seems like it's a -- it's a one-sided approach that you're taking even in the review. And I -- I wouldn't -- wouldn't recommend going down that road for any of these folks. But I just wanted to point that out.

And one last thing coz I know I'm running out of time. In the February report, the FCC, some of your staff in the working group, recommended eliminating some of the reports that are out there, the Orbit report, the International Broadband report, and Modifying Video Competition report and Cable Price and Service, some of those things.

I've got a piece of legislation we've passed out of the Full House twice now, very bipartisan figures unanimous earlier in this Congress called the FCC Consolidated Reporting Act, which really tries to -- to take a -- a broad view and into eliminate a lot of the outdated reports, the streamline reporting process, something that I think you've seen bipartisan's report to do in the House.

We're trying to get the Senate to take that up. I'm not sure if you've got a comment on what you think should happen there, if that's something you're supportive of generally, especially as it relates to -- to the Bipartisan Bill in the House trying to move through the Senate to also would become law to streamline the process as your staff is suggesting some of these areas.

WHEELER: So -- so, you know, in the Senate side, it's Senator Heller who has been...

SCALISE: Yeah.

WHEELER: ...pushing on this. And I know that he and Senator Rockefeller are talking about it in terms of their package of legislation over there. I definitely agree that -- that there are -- there is a plethora of reports and that we are spending a lot of time that could be better organized, shall we say.

SCALISE: Including competitiveness in the telegraph industry which is still on the books, which we're trying to get rid off in this bill over there. I appreciate that and anything you can do to help us advocate for the advancement. I do think that's one area where we found a lot of bipartisans support in the way it passed the House. Hopefully we can get the Heller bill move through the Senate as well on the -- and get that to the present statute.

WHEELER: Thank you, gentleman.

SCALISE: Thank you very much for your time. And I yield back as well my time.

WALDEN: Thank you very much, Mr. Scalise. I do not see any member in the Democratic side. Mr. Kinzinger of Illinois is recognized.

KINZINGER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And thank you for being here today with us. I know it's a lot of...

WHEELER: Thank you for your patience, Mr. Kinzinger.

KINZINGER: Yeah, you're welcome. I might be the end. Wow. So -- but we had a lot of big issues we want to talk about. I'm just going to hit a couple right now. I'd like to talk to you a little -- I know it was -- it was touched earlier about the E-Rate Program.

I'm a big supporter of the intentions of this program and especially it's modernization. And I appreciate the Commission putting on the recent workshop on this issue. I have a few concerns I want to address.

I represent a rural district with a number of very small schools and libraries. And over the past few months, I've reached out to a lot of these entities and asked them what their concern is and -- and asked them about their participation or their lack of participation in the program to see what concern -- concerns or issues they have with the program itself.

The number one problem raised in these conversations was the complexity involved in both applying for and eventually receiving the funding necessary to move forward in implementing new technology in their facilities through the E-Rate Program.

In hearing this, I actually looked into the issue a little further and found out that the basic application for funding, and this is the process of it, but the basic application is 17 pages long. And with additional technologies not being necessary can run even longer, i.e. Wi-Fi. I would actually probably rather punch myself in the face and be the guy that has to fill this out.

So the complexity of the -- of the application process has actually caused a number of these schools to spend money on outside consultants to help guide them through this process. And this is money that's no longer being spend on our students and automatically puts many smaller rural schools at a disadvantage coz they don't have the funds necessary to pay this out so I can sell them. Essentially, we leave individuals in a technological desert if you will.

As the Commissioner continues these efforts to modernize the E- Rate Program, what are your plans to simplify the application process for these small and rural districts. And also, will you commit to working to address the issues faced by these schools who have routinely told me they simply cannot afford to pursue these funds.

WHEELER: Congressman, I share your shock and dismay. We're gonna fix it.

KINZINGER: Good. All right. Do you have an idea of a timeframe? How long?

WHEELER: Yeah, we're gonna...

KINZINGER: We're busy. We're going home.

WHEELER: It's gonna be part of our -- of our E-Rate modernization program that we'll be bringing forward. There's actually a series of things that we're gonna begin administratively even before that -- that rulemaking takes place. It is -- yes, sir. I mean I...

KINZINGER: All right.

WHEELER: I'm as -- you know, how do we get online. So it becomes an interesting challenge. So here we are talking about broadband access for schools and libraries and we have a 17-page paper process.

KINZINGER: Right.

WHEELER: So unfortunately, it's not something that you can solve just like this because as I've indicated like to Mr. Welch, we have awful IT systems. But what I would like to get to is for your schools and all schools and libraries to be able to get online to make their filling, to be able to track that filling and where things stand, and to do it less frequently than annually.

KINZINGER: Right.

WHEELER: Well, I appreciate that. I want to touch on one other quick issue in this short amount of time. Again, thank you for your consideration with the -- the E-Rate issue.

I'm concerned with the process and policy rationale used to changed the FCC's treatment of broadcast JSAs for the purpose of the broadcast ownership rules. The decision to count TV JSAs' ownership has the effect of tightening ownership restrictions without the comprehensive review of the ownership rules that is required by statute. And your analysis seem to lack an appreciation for the public interest benefited -- benefits fostered by JSAs.

In Rockford, for instance, an area I represent, without these agreements, the Fox station produces actually a Hispanic newscast and they've said that they will not be able to produce that Hispanic newscast, for instance. Well, I don't believe my local TV station should have to fight for a waiver and we can have a broader issue on the whole discussion in general.

I do wanna say in light of your rule, are you gonna make sure that these stations can take advantage of waivers and will there be clear transparent standards for applying for waivers in this process.

WHEELER: Thank you, Congressman because you've raised a really important point about waivers.

The reality was why we had to deal with JSAs is there was becoming a cottage industry in this town, down on K Street of lawyers figuring out creative ways to get around the ownership rules of the Commission's head in place forever. And JSAs were a favorite way of doing that.

What we have said is that you have to have attributable ownership as you've indicated. But that there is a waiver process to address exactly what you're talking about in Rockford. And yes it's an expedited process, and it is a -- it's a -- it's a situation unfortunately where -- where the process took over and perverted the underlying rules and the basic concepts of ownership.

KINZINGER: We can -- and -- and we can have that broader discussion when I have more time. My time is expired but I will say I've heard a lot of concerns from local TV stations even on my district. And I hope that, you know, while we disagree with the rule, I hope that you make it very clear how they can apply for these waivers and how they can get this thing carry them. Mr. Chairman, I yield back and thank you.

WHEELER: Yes, thank you.

WALDEN: Thank you very much. In behalf of Mr. Matheson and of myself, thank you Chairman Wheeler for your testimony this morning. We look forward to working with you in the future. And the hearing is now adjourned.

TEXT:

WALDEN: We'll call to order the Subcommittee on Communications and Technology and certainly want to welcome our members and our witness, the Chairman of the Federal Communications Commission. Mr. Wheeler, we're delighted that you would make time to come and spend with us on this important day, with so much going on in the telecommunications world.

Six months ago this subcommittee met for the very first time with the current complement of FCC commissioners, and welcomed Mr. Wheeler as the new chairman. Today, and let me welcome Mr. Wheeler back, we meet to review the record of action and selective inaction that the commission has taken under the first six months of your leadership. Unfortunately, given some of the most recent actions out of the commission, I fear that we may be heading into some rough waters.

When we last met, I offered two pieces of advice to Chairman Wheeler, and his colleagues. First, I urged them to heed the words of Congress, where it was - has spoken and reject calls to act in ways contrary to Congressional intent. Second, I urged them to bear in mind that even seemingly small changes in the Federal Communications Commission rules can have significant impact on the marketplace. I called upon all the members of the commission to discharge their duties with transparency, accountability and a long view of the technological landscape. In sum, my advice was that they must approach their duties with humility and restraint.

Unfortunately, recent actions have hinted that my advice was ignored. In December, we had yet to know that the DC Circuit Court of Appeals would once again reject the commission's attempt to regulate the Internet and could only speculate as to whether the commission under Chairman Wheeler's lead would mount a third attempt. Sadly, we now know the answer. Not only is Chairman Wheeler leading us down this path again, the item the commission adopted last week tees up the long dead idea that the Internet is a common carrier.

This reinvigorated willingness to consider regulating the Internet under Title II of the Communications Act, rules that find their roots in the 19th century railroad regulation, and were designed to regulate the world of telephone monopoly, harking back to a world in which twisted copper was the only portal for consumers, the communications network and voice the only service. The modern communications landscape bears no resemblance to the world Title II was meant to regulate, and application of Title II to the Internet is, at best, a poor fit. Worse still, the practical consequences of reclassification are to give the bureaucrats at the FCC the authority to second guess business decisions and to regulate ever possible aspect of the Internet.

We should all pause and consider the prospect of the FCC as a rate setting authority over Internet access and what that means for innovation in the telephone network of yesteryear. We should also be aware that this path opens a door for states to regulate the Internet. Contrary to any intended effect, the reclassification of broadband service under Title II will harm consumers, halt job creation, curtail innovation and stifle investment.

In sum, at a time when the commission at Congress' direction is taking steps toward even greater growth and innovation across Internet access platforms, the commission is simultaneously contemplating rules that undermine those very efforts and compromise the fundamental approaches of both the Clinton and Bush Administrations that laid the foundation for the Internet that we know today.

It's troubling that some of the actions taken under Chairman Wheeler's watch, the selective inaction of the FCC is equally troubling. Although required under the Telecommunications Act, the Federal Communications Commission has failed to complete its quadrennial review of the limitations on ownership of broadcast properties. It's been six years, six years, since the commission last fulfilled this statutory mandate. Rather than focus on ensuring that the rules reflect reality, however, the chairman has now announced that the commission would essentially scrap the 2010 quadrennial review and begin in earnest its 2014 quadrennial review.

Now, notwithstanding this stale record, the FCC also moved forward to make major changes to the regulations that govern media ownership anyway. It adopted changes to its attribution rules that determine how to count stations toward the local television ownership rule, the FCC also stated that it would begin counting certain shared service agreements toward the local ownership cap. In order to comply with local ownership rules, these pronouncements will likely force broadcasters to divest stations and unwind shared service agreements that are beneficial to ensuring local content in the smaller markets. These changes do not bring benefits to the communities served by these broadcasters, drawing into question how this change could serve the public interest.

Finally, FCC process reform has been an ongoing priority of our subcommittee. It's an issue my colleagues and I are deeply invested in, as demonstrated by the unanimous passage in the House of the bipartisan Federal Communications Commission Process Reform Act on March 11th of this year. Unfortunately, after the events of the past few months I'm sad to say I continue to be troubled by the FCC's seemingly flawed process.

In March the FCC chose to restrict license transfers involving certain shared service agreements which had long been blessed - implicitly blessed by the commission. This action was not debated by the commissioners, nor was it subject to any kind of vote. Rather, it was announced by the chief of the media bureau as a fait accompli.

Recent press reports also allege the chairman's office withheld presentation of revisions to the Open Internet Notice of Proposed Rulemaking from Republicans for as long as 24 hours, after having provided the material to the Democratic commissioners and to the press during the run up to the May 15th FCC Open Meeting. The concern raised by these reports is only compounded by revelations that a substantially revised draft of another item scheduled for vote at the open meeting was not presented to other offices until the closing minutes of the evening before.

According to Commissioner Pai's dissent from the commission's mobile spectrum holdings item, his office received the revised item fewer than 12 hours before the open meeting and the item contained more than 3,000 revisions. So, I find myself channeling Commissioner Rosenworcel, who said of the Open Internet NPRM, that the quote, "Process that got us this rule making today is flawed." Closed quote. Committee has opined in the past that withholding of a revised draft item from other members of the commission until the 11th hour precludes the scrutiny and analysis necessary for ease in decision making. It's my hope that these occurrences were anomalies. Perhaps

Chairman Wheeler will want to commit today to providing his fellow commissioners with adequate and equal time to review proposed orders and rules.

The transformative impact of the evolution of technology from a long - analog to digital, from narrow band to broadband, has forever altered our lives. The evolution continues and the commission has before it the issues I just mentioned and many more, all significant in their impacts on our lives and the economy. Stated in your written testimony, you're eager to build on the progress of the last six months going forward, and I hope working together we can move forward in a direction that protects the success, this critical sector of the economy has enjoyed and facilitates its continued growth and job creation unencumbered by over regulatory overreach.

With that, I yield back, and I recognize my friend and colleague from California, Miss Eshoo, the Ranking Member of the subcommittee for her opening statement.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and good morning to all of my colleagues and welcome back to the committee, Chairman Wheeler. Before we do a - a deep dive into the specifics of the chairman's proposal as well as so many other major issues that are before the FCC, I - I think that it would be well for us to step back and appreciate what I believe is one of the most consequential inventions in human history. This was dreamed of and built by disruptors. It's an American story, it's a product of American genius, the Internet. One word, but it is - it really it takes one's breath away in terms of the arc of history.

It's not only an invention, it has reshaped lives, economies here and around the world, and our thinking and our debate today really should be viewed, I think, through the prism of a critical step that we're taking now in the 21st Century. The Internet is a continuum of change. It's accessible. It's open. And its innovations continue. They empower individuals, entire fields of learning, growing not only our economy but economies around the world, and serving humanity in countless ways. All of this has taken place and here we are, in the second decade of the 21st Century.

So, this is huge. This is huge. This is not what is behind door number one, door number two, door number three, where the price is right. This is not some guessing game. This is huge. This is something, these decisions are going to affect every single American going forward, just as it has in the past and it will continue to. So, all of us, regulators, innovators, consumers, legislators, we have to get this right. The stakes are very high and American cannot lose. It's been our leadership that has advanced the digital age. And, now is not the time and, actually, I don't think there should be ever a time to unravel the values that have really been the hallmarks and the bulwarks of the Internet.

So, the question is: how do we seize the future? At least in my view that's what the question is. I know what I want to see continue: openness, free, accessible, these are also the hallmarks of our democracy. And that's what this has been such an extraordinary export of - of our country.

I know what I don't want. I don't want this to become an auction, selling off the best in bits and pieces, where some pay for faster lanes. Others can't pay, they get stuck in the slow lane. Some giant company blocking content and others discriminating so that they can sell their stuff to keep the other guy's stuff stymied. That's not a very pretty description, but it's a street description of what can be at hand.

I want every day to be essentially the Fourth of July for American innovation. So, that it just keeps bursting. It just keeps bursting. And I see it every day in my Congressional district. Looking forward 10 years. 25 years, 50 years, I want this to continue and we should all be thinking on a grand scale, because this growth and this economic driver should be for everyone. We need smart, savvy regulations - regulatory decision, we need a Congress that's engaged in this, and a Congress that's vigilant, and I plan to be.

So, what should the FCC do? I think, and all the articles you read, there's a debate: should it be 706 or should it be Title II? I think that we have to have a clear eyed understanding of what has made the Internet what it is today and what basic values need to be protected and preserved. And then what that is going to look like. And there's more, on top of all of this. Can anyone here today piece together the effects of a Comcast Time Warner merger and an AT&T DirecTV merger on consumers and a free and Open Internet? These are massive decisions, and massive pieces that are moving forward. And what's going to happen to innovation?

Mr. Chairman, Chairman Walden, I urge you to convene a hearing to examine these issues here. I think they deserve to be examined and to be debated and questions asked. So, as I said earlier, every person in the country will be affected by the outcome of these decisions that are before the commission and before us. And, so I look forward to questioning Chairman Wheeler today.

I also ask for unanimous consent that two letters, two very important letters be entered into the record. One, signed by more than a hundred venture capitalists and angel investors who support simple, strong, enforceable rules against online discrimination and access fees. And the other, signed by more than 100 Internet companies, small and large. Mostly small. That support a free and Open Internet.

WALDEN: Without objection.

ESHOO: And I don't know if I have any time remaining. No. I think I've gone over. Well, with that, I'll yield back what I don't have.

WALDEN: Thank the gentlelady for her opening statement and the letters. We'll now turn to the full committee chairman, Mr. Fred Upton, from Michigan for opening comments.

UPTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Oversight is a critical part of this committee's work to foster a smaller, more nimble government for the innovation age. We've held lots of hearings, with all of the FCC's commissioners to address issues of national importance, to keep a close eye on the budget, and to ensure that commission process focusing on promoting jobs and innovation, and today's oversight hearing with Chairman Wheeler will continue that discussion to ensure that the FCC works in a way that benefits consumers, industry and certainly the economy. And I thank you for coming today.

There's a lot to discuss. In the six months since Mr. Wheeler was confirmed as char he has addressed a number of items, including media ownership, the IP transition, universal service and just this past week, of course, the incentive auctions and net neutrality. While I appreciate the chairman's leadership, on one of these I have serious concerns with some others.

As an initial matter, Chairman Wheeler started off his chairmanship with a review of FCC procedure, an issue that this subcommittee has spent lots of time working to reform in a bipartisan manner. But, I was disappointed to see some of the process failures that occurred last week. Media reports of an Open Meeting item being circulated to commissioners as late as midnight the evening before the vote on one item, in what seems to be partisan sharing of items with Democrats as much as 24 hours before sharing them with Republicans on another is particularly concerning. Regardless of political affiliation, commissioners must be given adequate and equal time to consider the items on which they're going to vote. Let us all hope that such incidents of favoritism and selective sharing are isolated and not emblematic of the chairman's new operating procedure.

Additionally, I continue to be concerned with the commission's ongoing defiance of its statutory obligations to complete the 2010 quadrennial review of media ownership rules. Despite the commission's woefully outdated record on this issue, it has nonetheless moved forward with changes that effectively bar joint sales agreements and change commission treatment of shared service agreements under its media attribution rules. These actions, in the absence of the statutorily required media ownership review, do raise significant questions about the commission's commitment to making decisions informed by facts and utilizing sound process.

And, lastly, I am troubled by the chairman's insistence on attempting to regulate the Internet under rules that were informed by 19th Century railroad regs, and adopted to regulate the monopoly telephone network of the past. The Internet has indeed flourished under the current light touch regulatory scheme, and subjecting to burdensome regs is a leap in the wrong direction. Title II is inappropriate for the Internet, and attempting to reclassify it would be harmful to consumers, businesses and the future of the Internet as we know it. Nobody wants telephone service to look like it did in 1984, and we certainly shouldn't wish for our Internet access to return to that rotary phone era either. The communications sector is vital to our national economy and commission auction - action on even small items can have broad impact. I thank Chairman Wheeler for being here today. Look forward to working together toward a bipartisan, measured, transparent and responsible actions that do benefit consumers, job creation and our economy. And I yield my balance of my time to be split between Mr. Latta and Mr. Barton.

LATTA: Well, thank you, Mr. Chairman for yielding and Chairman Walden I appreciate you holding this hearing today, and welcome Chairman Wheeler. Thanks for being here.

The communications and technology industry is heralded as a vibrant, dynamic and productive sector of our economy. This is not by accident, as networks and services transition to IP based platforms, they've had the flexibility to grow, advance and evolve in large part because they have not been subjected to the stifling hand of legacy government regulation. We've pursued a light touch regulatory approach to the Internet ecosystem, because we've seen time and again, that it serves as a catalyst for increased investment, innovation, job creation and competition.

As I look forward to develop policies that would further this growth, we'd be remiss to overlook the significance of how regulatory restraint has been fundamental - a fundamental component of the industry's success. That's why I'm concerned with some of the proposals emerging from the FCC, particularly in consideration of reclassifying broadband Internet access service, telecommunications service under Title II of the Communications Act. This policy would be an extreme exercise of government overreach and likely result in failed websites, downgraded and poor customer service, less choice and flexibility for consumers, businesses and stifling of innovation through regulation.

Unwanted attempts to manufacture and shape markets outcomes propose solutions in search of problems impose antiquated regulation will frustrate future progress and innovation. I intend to introduce legislation that prevents the FCC from following through on this misguided regulatory proposal. Mr. Chairman, with that I yield back the balance of my time. And I yield to Mr. Barton.

BARTON: (AUDIO GAP) We just welcomed Chairman Wheeler and the question before the committee today are we soon going to be calling him Mr. Wheeler Dealer? With that, I - I'll put my statement in the record in the interest of time, and yield back to the chairman.

WALDEN: Thank you, Chairman. Gentleman yields back. Now turn to the gentleman from California, Mr. Waxman for opening comments.

WAXMAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And I want to welcome back Chairman Wheeler. The Federal Communications Commission had a historic week last week. You are tackling some of the most complex and pressing issues in the communications sector today.

In 2012, Congress gave the FCC a big job: create the world's first incentive auction to ensure that beachfront, low band spectrum is put to its highest economic value, and you established the ground rules for this crucial auction last week. You had a hard job, because you needed to balance four potential - potentially conflicting objectives. One, maximizing the amount of spectrum made available for auction. Two, promote competition. Three, create bands of unlicensed spectrum to spur innovation. And, four, raise money. It appears you hit this one out of the ballpark.

I particularly want to commend you for your work to advance unlicensed spectrum. Your plan will create three channels of beachfront, unlicensed spectrum throughout the nation. The vision of new, super Wi-Fi can now become a reality.

I also want to commend you for promoting competition, by reserving spectrum for competitive carriers. It would be an enormous setback for innovation and consumers if the incentive auction turns the wireless market into a duopoly, dominated by Verizon and AT&T. This auction is the best, and possibly the last, chance the FCC has to invigorate competition.

I would have preferred if you reserved even more spectrum for competitive carriers, but I recognize the pressures you are under and your need to secure three votes. By the way, you may hear arguments today from Republicans on this committee that you lack the authority to promote competition. These claims are nonsense and contradict the express language of the statute.

Last week you also launched the FCC's third attempt in eight years to protect the Open Internet. You didn't hit this one out of the park, but you didn't need to, either. You made a wide decision to solicit comment on a wide range of options. As I wrote you, this time has come to - wrote you, the time has come to end the legal gymnastics and stop the lobbying games being played by the big broadband providers.

In 2010, Verizon, AT&T and Comcast pled with the FCC not to use its undisputed authority under Title II of the Communications Act. And, then, after FCC did what they wanted, Verizon sued the agency for lacking authority when the FCC agreed with the company. This time, you need a different approach. You should use your Title II authority as a backstop authority to protect the Open Internet. If you want to proceed under Section 706, as your main legal theory that's fine. But you shouldn't water down the Open Internet rules to fit Section 706. Instead, you should get the substance right, and invoke Title II as an independent basis of authority.

The FCC has already lost two rulings in court over the Open Internet. You don't have to choose between weak rules and a weak legal case. You can issue strong rules, and have a strong legal case, if you use a belt and suspender approach to the next rule making. I look forward to exploring this issue with you further in the question period. In the meantime, I want to yield the balance of my time to my friend and colleague, Congresswoman Matsui.

MATSUI: Thank you very much, Ranking Member Waxman, for yielding me time and welcome, Chairman Wheeler. The FCC certainly has a lot on its plate. The commission is considering net neutrality rules, rules on the broadcast incentive auction, the AWS-III auction, USF and E- Rate reforms in two very significant mergers. I'm confident the FCC will be able to demonstrate that it can walk and chew gum at the same time.

This subcommittee should also do its part. For one, I join in calling for the chairman to hold oversight hearings on the two proposed mergers between Comcast and Time Warner. And on AT&T and DirecTV. Both are some of the largest mergers in our nation's telecommunications history. Americans, including many in my district of Sacramento, are seeing the trends towards consolidation, content and peering deals, and how they hear phrases like, paid prioritization, and wondering what is going on? What does all this mean for them, for competition and for the economy?

It has been encouraging that so many Americans are speaking up in support of protecting an Open Internet. I was one who thought the FCC should have taken more time to deliberate on what net neutrality rules the commission should propose. But we are where we are. The proposal has certainly improved over the last few weeks. It is still far from perfect. I support a ban on paid prioritization deals. We can't afford a two tiered Internet system.

I look forward from hearing from you today, and I yield back the balance of my time.

WALDEN: Gentlelady yields back the balance of her time. And with that, you've heard from us, or at least a few of us up here, Mr. Chairman. Now, we're delighted to have you here, and we look forward to your - your opening statement and comments. And thank you, again, for the work you're doing. Go ahead.

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and members of the - of the committee. As you've pointed out, it's been about six months since we last sat down. And what I wanted to do was to highlight some of the things that we have done in that period, and then engage in a dialogue with you with whatever topics that you would like to address.

As has been evidenced by a lot of these comments up here, one of the principal responsibilities of - of the commission is dealing with the spectrum crunch. And we have taken a significant step forward in terms of getting more spectrum out to the market. We had the H Block auction, which raised a billion and a half dollars for 10 MHz spectrum. We have opened a new 100MHz swath in the 5GHz band, which is already being referred to as gigabyte Wi-Fi, because of the incredible throughput that it enables.

We have begun a proceeding on spectrum sharing in 3.5 GHz, and we announced yesterday that in accord with the mandate of this committee and Congress to auction off AWS-III spectrum. That we will begin the auction on November 13th, and we will finish as per your mandate February - we will license February 22, 2015.

We have also, as some of the committee had noted established a new set of mobile spectrum holding rules, which have been praised by everybody from public interest groups to small operators, to large operators as - as was commented by Mr. Waxman, hitting the ball out of the park. And we have begun the incentive auction process. It's - you mandated us as - as you've said, with a non-trivial task. And we have - we have taken the first important steps to that.

On the question of universal service and what's going on there, we have fulfilled the pledge that I made to this committee last time we were together, to eliminate the infamous quantile regression analysis. And, we're seeking comments on what its replacement should be. We have funded the Connect America fund to provide connectivity to five million more Americans who do not have access to broadband today. That's about a third of the total, and a significant bite out of - out of that. And we're seeking input on multiple additional issues: throughput standards, should we, as - as technology increases and bandwidth increases, do we need to think about higher bandwidth that is supported by the Connect America fund? How do we best deal with the mobile component of broadband delivery in Connect America? And how best to support broadband for rate of return carriers? Those are all proceedings that we have underway.

We have - we have made some significant strides, also, in the area of public safety. We took a good chunk out of the FirstNet $7.5 billion with the H-Band auction. Expect, obviously, that the AWS-III auction will do more and I wouldn't be surprised if we show up at the incentive auction having met the requirement, or at least taking a huge bite out of the requirement for funding FirstNet.

We had a rule making on text to 911, you know, phones aren't used just for talking anymore, but texting and - and so if you want to text to an emergency service provider, we had a rule making on that, the major carriers stepped up and literally in the last couple of days, they all met their goals for implementation on that, which is a terrific step forward. And we've also initiated a further notice on location accuracy, because as wireless usage increases and particularly as it replaces what's - wired line connections inside, and as GPS usage has increased, there's been a fascinating reality that location accuracy has actually declined. And, we've got a notice going on how do we address that, because that's literally a matter of life and death.

As you mentioned we began the 2014 quadrennial review on media issues with a - an expedited delivery date. We closed a loophole that was being exploited to get around the ownership rules, using joint services agreement, and we brought competition back to the retransmission consent negotiations. We have also continued to press on the reform issues that so many of you and I share in common as being important.

Last time we were together, I told you we stood up a task force to deal with this. That task force came back with 154 recommendations. About three quarters of those are now well along their way to being in process. They kind of break into two parts. There are procedural issues that you might associate with administrative procedure act, and things like this. And there's also just how do you make the agency more efficient?

And last week, as many have discussed, we opened a Notice of Proposed Rulemaking on preserving and protecting the Open Internet. It's important to recognize that there are no protections for an Open Internet in place today. The January court decision affirmed the commission's authority under Section 706 to deal with the Open Internet, and identified what I call a road map for how to achieve that. And what I have proposed in a method that follows that road map.

I understand that there is a great debate on this issue. I heard the debate here this morning. Between those who say there is no need and those who say it ought to be a regulated utility. What we have tried to do is to follow the court's direction, the road map, the blueprint, and to come up with a proposal that stops blocking, that prohibits anything that degrades a consumer's access, including prioritization. That asks a broader question about prioritization as to whether it should be banned outright, and if so, how, and then engages in the discussion that we've heard already this morning about Title II versus 706, and collecting a broad scope of learned information on that.

I've consistently said that there is only one Internet. There's not a fast Internet and a slow Internet. There's not special service Internet and non. There is one Internet, and the - when the consumer buys access to the Internet, they are buying access to the full Internet. And that's what our rules attempt to protect. This has become a debate among legal approaches - about legal approaches.

It's a healthy debate. It's a debate that our Notice of Proposed Rulemaking furthers with multiple requests for input, but my position has been similar to that of the Consumer Federation of America, and that is that we ought to explore the powers that are granted in the '96 act, specifically Section 706, keep asking how Title II fits in, but develop a regulatory policy that looks forward not backward, because what we need is a regulatory plan for the 21st Century. And I look forward to discussing that with you, Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee.

WALDEN: Mr. Wheeler, chairman, thank you for being here. We appreciate your work, and - and your willingness to come and spend some time with us and - and respond to our questions.

I want to pick up on the Middle Class Tax Relief Act, which as you know, was designed to create a forum where broadcasters could volunteer their spectrum up for auction, for mobile broadband use. Never been done quite like proposed, and you've got, we - we all knew that going in, but it seemed like a good balance. The critical term in all of this was that the broadcasters would volunteer to put their spectrum up, they wouldn't be forced into it. That was the agreement. Yet, many of the actions that we've seen coming out of the commission would lead some to believe that the FCC might be bulling broadcasters into giving up spectrum without providing hard data and clear models so that the broadcasters can thoroughly and thoughtfully deliberate and choose to participate or not in this first of its kind auction.

Let me tell you what I'm - I'm thinking here. For example, the joint sales agreements that are now outlawed. These agreements essentially offer broadcasters a viable business model in small markets that would otherwise suffer from lack of service. You're considering the attribution value of UHF stations, such that more broadcasters could end up in violation of that the national cap under the broadcast ownership rule, and the FCC has failed to process broadcasters' petitions for allocation changes from VHF to UHF, even though the petitions were filed prior to Middle Class Tax Relief Act.

And, finally, you're seeking to use a modified version of OET-69. I'm hearing about this to repack broadcasters. This will likely result in reduced coverage for broadcasters that choose to stay in the business, making the business itself less viable. So ,the very people you're trying to incent to put spectrum, so that it'll be available for auction, I think are - are concerned about where the commission's headed in a number of areas. Can you explain to me how these actions will actually encourage broadcasters to participate in this auction?

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I think the goal here, that we have been trying to follow, is - is not to discourage or to encourage, but to follow through with our responsibilities. And - and that means enforcing and updating our rules ...

WALDEN: Do you think any of these, though, do you think any of these things I've just cited encourage broadcasters to participate more? If you don't have broadcasters showing up with spectrum ...

WHEELER: So, I -I, as I said, Mr. Chairman, I -I don't think that we have an important, as you said, an important and historic role. This is an incentive auction.

WALDEN: I'm aware of that. Yes.

WHEELER: What we have tried to do in the mobile spectrum holdings rule, for instance, is to encourage broadcasters -encourage, I'm sorry, wireless carriers to buy, which creates the incentive. The interesting thing, there was a -a report by one of the Wall Street analysts last week who said we expect the greatest risk to this auction, broadcasters not showing up, just dropped. Because the fact that AT&T suggested that they're ready to bid between $9 and $18 billion ...

WALDEN: Right.

WHEELER: ...for 20 to 40MHz, this analyst said should send positive signals to broadcasters. So, our goal is to...

WALDEN: All right ...

WHEELER: ...is to create this marketplace and we're not trying to take regulatory action ...

WALDEN: All right, well ...

WHEELER: in -in unrelated areas that would ...

WALDEN: But you are taking lots of regulatory actions, and it does have an effect on the marketplace. I mean, those two are facts. (AUDIO GAP) If -if we don't have these broadcasters coming to the table voluntarily, there won't be spectrum available. So, I want to steal a line from the distinguished gentleman from Michigan, and that this one I refer to as Mr. Dingle, to see if I can get, just sort of some yes or nos here. Will you commit that the FCC will not score television stations based on their (AUDIO GAP). That's yes, actually. That you will commit that you will not score it. Will you commit the FCC, is that correct?

WHEELER: Yes.

WALDEN: Yes. You will commit the FCC will ensure that broadcasters' cost to reallocate are covered by the $1.75 billion relocation fund?

WHEELER: We believe that that fund will be adequate. That's - that's ....

WALDEN: OK.

WHEELER: ...that's what Congress told us to spend. Period.

WALDEN: And will you commit to completing frequency coordination with Canada and Mexico before the auction?

WHEELER: I think the issue there is what is the term complete? As you know on the DTV transition it never came down to actual signing on paper, but we understood where each other were, and I am very confident that we will be at that kind of a point.

WALDEN: Because that's critical. And will you commit to revoking only those low powered TV and translator licenses that are necessary to complete the auction?

WHEELER: Yes.

WALDEN: Thank you. And, I think I'm out of time. So, with that, I would now yield to the gentlelady, my friend from California, Miss Eshoo.

ESHOO: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. A lot of things to discuss, but I want to bore down on, or bore into some of the particulars on your recent proposal relative to -to the Internet, on net neutrality. I've argued, many advocates for net neutrality have argued that paid prioritization represents a fundamental departure from the Internet as we know it. I -I'm just kind of restating what is obvious, but I think that when you have hundreds of thousands of people communicating from across the country to you on it, that it is -that it's important to raise. Now, as a policy, not as a legal question, do you think that paid prioritization should be blocked outright?

WHEELER: So, I have said, Congresswoman, that I don't believe there ought to have and have nots.

ESHOO: No, no, just answer my question.

WHEELER: That -- that -that ...

ESHOO: Just tell me. Do you think that it should be blocked outright?

WHEELER: We have asked that question in the rulemaking. And - and what I have said is that I believe that under Section 706, anything that is anti-competitive or anti-consumer is competitively unreasonable and therefore can and should be blocked. And that becomes the trigger for how you deal with paid prioritization.

ESHOO: Yes, now what happens ...

WHEELER: On the question of per se that you asked...

ESHOO: Yes.

WHEELER: ...we've specifically asked how and whether.

ESHOO: Now, what happens if the FCC determines that there's no outright -no way to outright - create an outright ban, and these paid agreements under 706, where does that leave you? Where does that leave the country?

WHEELER: So - so when the court gave us our instructions, they talked about what they called the virtuous cycle, and that is that - that content drives the need for conduit, which then creates the opportunity for content. And that this cycle is what it is our responsibility to protect. And that's - that's what 706 authorizes us to protect. And so what my proposal is is that we take them up on that. And we say if there is something that interferes with that virtuous cycle, which I believe paid prioritization does, that then we can move against it.

ESHOO: Yes. All right. But, now let's move over to Title II. Title II is described, it depends on who's describing it, it's either a scourge --it's been compared to the early railroad regulations in our country - to being the flip side, you know, the savior title. I talked about in my opening statement about the - the - one of the imprimaturs of the Internet has been consistent innovation. And, while there are those that, and I understand why people would move to Title II, because they want the Internet protected, and these values are -they're worth protecting. But I also believe that there is room for, in Title II, for heavy handed regulation, and I don't think that, well, let me put it this way, I think that we need a light but strengthful legal touch in this. Because the values are so essential, and people across the country, and in the world, I mean, I'm hearing from people from different parts of the world as well, are calling for these protections. How would you envision - how would you handle constraint under Title II?

WHEELER: Well ...

ESHOO: In terms of being the chief regulator?

WHEELER: So, as you know ...

ESHOO: Have you given thought to this?

WHEELER: Pardon me?

ESHOO: Have you given thought to this?

WHEELER: Yes, ma'am.

ESHOO: OK.

WHEELER: And -and as you know ...

ESHOO: As some people say share it with me.

WHEELER: As you know Title II, there is nothing in Title II that prohibits paid prioritization. As a matter of fact we have all kinds of paid prioritization exists ...

ESHOO: You're ...

WHEELER: ...today.

ESHOO: You're worrying me by bringing that up first. But anyway, go ahead.

WHEELER: So -so that, no, because it goes to you, I think, the root question of yours which is how do you forbear from that?

ESHOO: Yes.

WHEELER: OK? And - and so - so it is possible to go through and say, yes, we will not do this, we will not do this, we will not do this. In the - in the wireless context, interestingly enough, Congress created that - created wireless as a common carrier, but then specifically said but this doesn't apply, and this doesn't apply, and this doesn't apply.

ESHOO: Yes.

WHEELER: We can do that as a commission, as well. It has been proposed that that's an approach to take. There are also those who throw up their hands and ooh in great concern over that because they say, OK, well this commission may do this, but what about the next commission? And you can't bind a future commission by making those kinds of - of determinations. So, what we have done in this NPRM is to ask the specific question about here's Section 706, here's Title II, let's compare them and contrast them with each other, and tell us what the pluses and minuses and the best ways to get through this are? And I think that leads us to the kind of answer that you're asking for today.

WALDEN: The gentlelady's time's expired. We'll go now to the gentlelady from Tennessee, Miss Blackburn, the Vice Chair of the full committee, for her questions.

BLACKBURN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And Mr. Wheeler, we thank you for taking the time to come and be with us. You've got a feisty term going over there, at the FCC, and in Tennessee we would say you're kicking up a little dust. And, it's causing concern.

Many of our content creators have a tremendous amount of concern about your approach, and many of our health care innovators, who are looking at apps in telemedicine concepts and things of that nature, are also expressing concern. And I think that probably your actions have inserted a good bit of uncertainty into the innovation sector that is looking at how we best utilize all things Internet to - for quality of life and access for economic development for health care, for - for innovation and I've got just a couple of simple questions for you.

First of all, on cost benefit analysis, and I thank you that last night your team sent a letter over to us on that question, but what concerns me was that in the letter you say that this is just a tool. Cost benefit analysis is just one of many tools that would go into your decision. And your NPRM does not include an initial cost benefit analysis, and your predecessor, Mr. Genachowski, in this committee came before us and assured us he was going to use this and I'm actually going to read you his statement that he gave to us. He said, during my tenure I brought particular focus to this process, including the - by directing the early involvement of our chief economist and the analytical process of rulemaking, and by having FCC staff consult with the Office of Information and Regulatory Affairs on best practices in conducting cost benefit analysis.

And I - I think it is an incredibly important component of this, to look at what the cost of net neutrality rules would be to the consumer, and also to industry, so I want to know from you: are you going to give us a commitment right now that you will conduct a thorough and extensive cost benefit analysis of the actual cost to the consumer and to industry on these rules?

WHEELER: Thank you, Ms. Blackburn, I agree that cost benefit analysis are crucial to decision making. And in this rulemaking we specifically ask what are the costs of one approach or another? And what are the benefits, one or another? So that we can collect that information and have that kind of analysis. I agree with the importance of cost benefit analysis.

BLACKBURN: OK. Let me ask you this, also. You know, the commission's fund really comes from those that are regulated by the FCC, but we have some that are not. They're impacted by this, but they are not regulated and paying those fees, so in the net neutrality context, for example, companies like Google and Netflix want the FCC to act on their behalf, and petition or visit the agency, if you will, in support of those efforts, but they free ride because they are not paying the fees and bearing that part of the regulatory burden. So, since they seem so ready and willing to rely on regulation to help them, with their business models, how would you recommend that those entities share in the cost, pay their part of the costs, funding the agency?

WHEELER: With all respect, that's above my pay grade. That's a decision that - that this committee and the Congress can make in setting those rules ...

BLACKBURN: I'm asking for what your recommendation would be? They come and they lobby you, and ...

WHEELER: So ...

BLACKBURN: ...and they're pushing the net neutrality rules, and while they may like what you are saying, because they want you to step in, we have a lot of people out there who are paying the fees that are not in favor of what you are doing, and we have a lot of innovators who are not in favor of what you are doing, and your door has the name chairman on it, so I'm asking what is your perspective?

WHEELER: So, our - our effort in all of this is to represent the American people, not company a or company b. We have been told by the Congress, from whom we can collect regulatory fees and we do. If there is a decision that we should collect regulatory fees from somebody else, that's something we obviously will take. If there is a decision that we should expand regulatory authority over other entities, that's obviously something we should do. But that is a decision that is out of our hands.

BLACKBURN: I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentlelady yields back. The chairman recognizes the gentlelady from California, Miss Matsui, for her questions.

MATSUI: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Chairman Wheeler, I'd like to understand, given the success of the Internet and the absence of prioritization, precisely what types of paid prioritization you believe will speed the deployment and adoption of broadband Internet access services? Given that paid prioritization agreements would be used as a barrier of entry to startup and small business, what prioritization arrangements, specifically, will be better for the Internet than the no prioritization norm we have today?

WHEELER: What we are trying to do in this item is to say that anything that affects that virtuous cycle that the court talked about, and I talked about before, is not appropriate. Is unlawful. And that would include paid prioritization. Now, the court told us to look at this on a case by case basis. We have asked the question in the rulemaking as to whether we should look at it generically, and say it's all out. And we're soliciting comments on that. But, you know, the concept of paid prioritization when I buy Internet access, I am buying the full pipe. I am buying access to everything that's out there, and if somebody comes along and says, oh, no, you can't get this unless you pay more, that's unreasonable, and should be banned. If somebody comes along and says to a content provider, you can't get on unless you pay more, that's unreasonable and that would not be permitted.

MATSUI: OK, well. You know, as for my part, other than public - public safety, I believe paid prioritization should be banned. I also think another concern here is the last mile equivalent we're seeing in peering. The fact that there's so much uncertainty with paid prioritization is troublesome. If this concept moves forward, we could inadvertently block the next Google or Amazon from the market without even knowing it. I'm concerned that your hands may be tied here. Even if the commission wanted to ban anti-competitive paid prioritization deals, you may not have the authority or tools to do so.

Chairman Wheeler, if you were to explain to my constituents what is occurring in the market right now with the two mergers, content and peering agreements, and now paid prioritization could be legitimized under a commercially reasonable standard. What would you tell them? Not just what it means for them, but also for competition and for economy as a whole

WHEELER: I would tell them that I felt that paid prioritization was commercially unreasonable, and therefore could be dealt with. And, that, on the question of peering, that that is a separate issue that the commission needs to look at and will be looking at. But I would emphasize that I am strong supporter of the Open Internet.

And I would also tell them a story that when I was an entrepreneur, I was shut out of cable systems, because they were closed networks. And, I would come with a new product and couldn't get on. And, then when I was a venture capitalist, before taking this job, that the companies that I was backing had to have access to the Internet, could only succeed if they had access to the Internet. So, I would say to them that I believe in an Open Internet. I've experienced closed networks and the harm they cause to innovation, and that I want to protect and preserve an Open Internet.

MATSUI: you know, I think this is a very critical time. When I have ordinary people, probably (ph) off the street, coming to me and asking me about all these things they've heard, because people today really depend on the Internet. Ordinary citizens, the entrepreneurs who are concerned about this, and who else we know - we may not know out there. So, it's very concerning to all of us that there is a potential that we may have a situation where we won't have an Open Internet. And I would also like you to consider some of these mergers. I mean, we feel like we're kind of in the Wild West of the digital economy now. And now with mergers coming forward. Can you commit to us, these large mergers that are before us, they may be different from each other, but can you commit to us here that the FCC will carefully scrutinize these deals? With a focus toward public interest?

WHEELER: Without hesitation. And with complete affirmation.

MATSUI: OK, thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: Chair now recognizes former chairman of the full committee, Mr. Barton, for his questions.

BARTON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and I want to echo the last question you asked Chairman Wheeler about low powered television. You and I are working on a bill, hopefully, to give them some protection. We understand that under current law they - they - they don't have standing when they repackage, but we hope to give them some at least priority or some help if and when we do do these repackaging of the spectrums. So I wanted to commend you for that last question.

I've listened Chairman Wheeler, to my friends on the Democratic side repeatedly talk about the Open Internet and whether you should try to regulate it under Section 706 or Title II. I think you're asking a false question. The Internet is open.

The question is what does the FCC do in terms of monitoring to make sure that it stays open? And, the analogy I'm going to use is not perfect, but I think it is instructive and educational. The airways that we fly back and forth from Washington to our districts are open, but they are regulated and monitored for a number of reasons by the FAA. If I call up American Airlines, and I say, I want to go from Washington -Reagan to DFW, they quote me a price, let's say it's $350 one way. But when I show up with my ticket, I get one seat on that plane. I don't' get to take a hundred of my friends, and put them on the plane with me because I happen to buy the ticket first, and show up first.

BARTON: So, it's obvious that it would be great for $350 if I could fill the plane.

But we allow the airlines to price by volume. You want one ticket, it's $350. You want two tickets, it's $700. Maybe if you want to buy the whole plane, they do give you a discount. It's only $250, but we don't let the first person to buy the ticket use the whole plane for $350.

And for all the bold talk about open access, what people are really trying to do is, you know, I want to pay a minimum price and get all this broadband, and I want to download everything from Netflix, and I don't want to pay if I download every movie they rent, or vice versa.

Netflix pays a basic price, and they can service 10 million people, instead of whatever it would be. So, you know, this -- this -- the broadband providers who have spent billions and billions of dollars, and have -- have networked this country and provided access through the competitive market principles, are not going to somehow, all of a sudden decide, as long as the FCC, which under your chairmanship, makes sure that it stays a competitive model.

They're -- they're going to continue to provide an open internet, but they may want to provide based on volume of use, some sort of a pricing system that allocates that it isn't a limited spectrum.

I see no reason to try to shoehorn some sort of a regulatory approach into either Title II, or Section 706, you know. Explain to me why my approach, which is what we've been doing and which works, is the wrong approach.

WHEELER: Let me see if I can respond to both parts of your question. First, on LPTV, we -- as I said to the chairman, we do not want to move those who don't have to be moved as part of it.

We also believe that there is opportunities to go to digital and the new efficiencies that that brings, just like it did in the -- in the Class A stations. And thirdly, we're opening a new rulemaking to specifically deal with that. So because we agree with the importance of low power and -- and translators.

To your -- to the second part of your question, let me take the chairman's hat off, and put my consumer hat on for a second, because two weekends ago, I called my ISP, and increased my capacity, because I wanted faster true plan (ph).

And they said for another $10 a month, we'll give you another, what turned out to be like, 20 MB. That's a marketplace transaction. That's something that's accepted now. That is not something that is part of the open internet rules.

What the open internet rules are trying to say, is that when I buy that capacity, I've bought that ride to every place on the internet, that somebody can't turn around and say oh, but you can't get that, or somebody can't turn around and say well, you can deliver that, Tom, but you've got to pay me an extra fee.

And so the concept of the open internet is that I have bought this broad pathway, and I have the right to use it, unfettered, in a -- on an open basis, and that's what we're trying to deliver in this rulemaking.

BARTON: I'm not -- my time's expired. I'm not trying to oppose that, but if you want -- you're looking at it from the consumer standpoint, that everybody should have access, but if you are a provider of content, you should be willing to pay more based on the number of items you're going to put at any given time on the open internet, so that everybody has access to it.

Because if you have a constrained pipeline, somebody has to make a decision how you put things into the pipeline, whether it's the airplane, or whether it's the airways, or the internet. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I yield back.

WALDEN: Gentleman yields back, the chair now recognizes the former chairman on the Democratic side, Mr. Waxman.

CHAIRMAN HENRY WAXMAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Chairman Wheeler, I commended your leadership earlier in my opening statement, about the spectrum auction, so I want to ask questions about a different subject, and that's net neutrality.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

WAXMAN: I commend you for tackling this issue, and for seeking comment on a broad range of issues, but I have serious concerns about some proposals that have been discussed. You've said that there would be presumption against broadband providers like Verizon, AT&T, and Comcast, entering into arrangements that give exclusive advantage, to their affiliates. Is that right?

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

WAXMAN: OK. What I don't understand, is why this presumption against exclusive arrangements would be limited to affiliates. Suppose Netflix entered into an exclusive arrangement with AT&T or Comcast for faster speeds for its videos that block competitors like Amazon Prime, from getting similar service.

I think that would be a serious threat to competition and an open internet, yet your proposal does not create a presumption against these exclusive arrangements. Why would you allow any exclusive arrangement that guarantees some content providers faster speeds than competitors can access?

WHEELER: Thank you, Mr. Waxman. This goes to the -- back to this virtuous (ph) cycle that the court talked about, and you know, it was interesting, yesterday in the Wall Street Journal, there was an article that interviewed a bunch of infrastructure manufacturers about the impact on that neutrality.

And they flat out said that if you offer fast lanes for some, you're going to degrade service for others. And I think that's at the heart of what you're talking about here. That would be commercially unreasonable under our proposal.

WAXMAN: OK. The problem with exclusive arrangements is they would let some companies block their competition from similar advantages. In markets where there are -- there is no, or only limited choices of broadband providers, that would stifle openness and competition.

I just want to say to you that I'm opposed to any form of paid prioritization. Paid prioritization divides the internet into the haves and the have-nots, and it will entrench the big companies at the expense of startups.

My understanding is that you've asked comment on a multi-factor test for determining whether -- determining when paid prioritization is permissible, and when it would be prohibited. My concern is that this will create a lot of ambiguity, and a lot of litigation.

I believe right lines would be much better for the market, and for innovation, so I'm going to ask you to consider a presumption against all paid prioritization as you develop final rules. Will you -- will you agree to consider this option?

WHEELER: Absolutely, and we have asked in the NPRM (ph) specifically whether, and if so, how do you accomplish it? So that is -- that is a ripe debate that is in the NPRM right now, sir.

WAXMAN: My understanding is that the reason you had proposed a complicated, multi-factored test, is concern about the court ruling. And I agree that if you're limited to acting under section 706, your options could be limited.

But if you are not limited to Section 706, you could establish a presumption against paid prioritization under Title II, and that's why it's so important for us -- for you to use your Title II authority as back stop authority.

You don't have to settle for a weak open internet rules if you exercise your full powers. And I'm glad you're looking at that possibility. Let me close by thanking you for seeking comment on the back stop proposal in the proposal adopted last week.

I'm committed to working with you to ensure the commission adopts strong and open internet protections for consumers and innovators, while encouraging continued investment in the online content and services we all rely on and enjoy today.

I think it's important that we get the substance right. We tried three times, we meaning you, at the FCC, because of the concern that the consumer have full access to what is on the internet, and full access to be able to use the internet to its greatest and maximum potential, and I would hate to see that net neutrality in any way be diminished if we have an opportunity under the law, as we look at it, to make sure that we get the substance right.

WALDEN: Thank you.

WAXMAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back his time, and now turn to the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, the vice chair of the subcommittee, Mr. Latta.

LATTA: Well thank you very much, Mr. Chairman, and again, Chairman Wheeler, thanks very much again for being here. There has been some discussion on Title II, and I'd like to follow up on some of that questioning.

Central premise of Title II regulation always been that the regulation was a substitute for competition. And two parts with a question, then. What types of findings have the commission made to justify entertaining the idea of Title II regulation of the internet?

And then do you believe the SEC should have to make a specific showing that of a market failure reform proposing rate regulation, or reporting requirements, that are the precursor to rate regulation?

WHEELER: So again, this -- these are the kinds of questions that we have tried assiduously not to decide on, but to ask about in this rulemaking. We're going to have to make a decision on exactly those questions at some point in time.

But what we want to achieve, is a record that gives everybody the opportunity to opine on that, so that we can be appropriately informed.

LATTA: Well let me ask you, what's your time line on that, then?

WHEELER: So we've got 60 days for comments, and then 45 days for reply comments.

LATTA: OK, so are you saying then that you're not ruling out rate regulation?

WHEELER: I'm saying we have asked the question about Title II, and -- and the full panoply of Title II. Yes, sir.

LATTA: OK, well -- let me ask you this, what have you been hearing from the community thus far, especially when you're saying that you are asking those questions, what have you -- what have you been hearing out there?

WHEELER: Excuse me. Well we have -- we've heard very little on the record thus far. There has been a great outpouring of people speaking to us through the press, people speaking to us through letters, and this sort of thing.

And as I indicated at the outset, there are two, diametrically opposed positions. One is that you should not do anything, and the other is that it should go all the way to being regulated like a public utility.

And our job is to find that which is best for consumers and best for encouraging investment in the internet, which itself is best for consumers.

LATTA: Let me go on with this question, while you've resolved some of the issues in the 5 GHz rulemaking, there are number of issues outstanding that have the potential to open up another 195 MHz of spectrum for unlicensed use. What is the FCC's and your plan for tackling the open issues?

WHEELER: In the 5 GHz?

LATTA: Right.

WHEELER: So there's -- there's -- actually think about 5 GHz, and 3 bytes. The first byte we've -- we've dealt with. That's the lower end of 5 GHz. In the middle component of 5 GHz, there are lots of national defense kind of activities, radar, and this sort of thing.

And the question is how can you work out sharing arrangements there? And we're working with those parties. On the upper end, is where you have spectrum that has been identified for intelligent traffic, ITFS, kinds of activities.

And that is based around the 802.11 standard. There are strong feelings about the need to protect that. I believe that it's possible to work together to meet both sets of needs, since it's based around a common 802.11 standard.

LATTA: Yeah, and in my remaining time, let me ask this last question, the SEC's 2011 universal service transformation, or transformation order, requires phone companies to set minimum prices that they can charge their consumers if they -- if the provider wants to continue receiving the same amount of funds from the US (inaudible) to support the high cost of the business.

So as a result, many of our rural consumers, the lot that I represent out there, will see the rate forward (ph) go from $14 to about $20.46. And while the communications act requires rural rates to be reasonably comparable to rates in urban areas, as affordable, reasonably comparable does not necessarily mean that the rural rate should be exactly the same as the urban rate when the rural customer might be able to call, only a few thousand people locally want urban call many times more than that.

And then should the rate be the same in the rural areas where the average income is significantly lower than it might in fact not be as affordable. The rate floor continues to be a concern for many of our telecommunications providers in my district, and other servicing rural America, where I understand that the SEC has agree to phase in the increase at $2.00 per year, and proposed a start date until -- or postponed that start date until after 2015.

Can you explain why the FCC interprets the reasonably comparable rates to mean exactly the same rates between urban and rural areas, considering the smaller pipe (ph) relation of rural calling areas, and in fact, that it was what is affordable in the largest urban areas is not what is also affordable to consumers in the rural.

WHEELER: Thank you. I'm glad you asked that question, it's an important question. The -- so -- so, as you stated, we're supposed to make sure that things are reasonably comparable. The reason for that is to make sure that the subsidies that some Americans are paying to deliver service to other Americans, don't end up being subsidies that some Americans are paying to reduce the bills of other Americans, but to overcome the high cost of getting it to them.

In some instances, it has been unfortunately the former, there are in 16 states, there are situations where consumers are paying -- some consumers are paying $5.00 a month for telephone service, because they're being subsidized by people in your district and other districts.

We need to get our arms around that. So what we've done, is to say OK, step 1 is Jack (ph) goes into effect January 15. Then what we're going to do is -- and that can't be more than $2.00 by the way.

And then what we're going to do is go back out with another survey that hits the kind of granularity you were talking about in terms of service, including long distance and these kinds of things, so that we have a better understanding of exactly what comparable means, and then lock at that issue again.

LATTA: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. My time has expired and I yield back.

WALDEN: The gentleman yields back. The chair now recognizes chairman emeritus of the committee, the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. Dingell.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, I thank you for your courtesy, and I commend you for holding this hearing. I'd like to welcome our old friend, Mr. Wheeler, back, fine public servant, and we're looking forward to good things of him.

Mr. Chairman, last week's open meeting, the commission adopted a number of big ticket items, including a new net neutrality NPRM, and draft rules for the upcoming incentive auction of broadcaster spectrum.

Concerning the former, I commend you for your efforts to keep the internet open, and will be watching the matter closely, as it goes forward. It's my hope the commission will work with this committee to ensure that any final action it takes to conform to its statutory authority, especially concerning Title II reclassification.

Now with respect to the incentive auction, I am interested in what the committee intends to do about treating broadcasters fairly. My questions will require a simple yes or no answer.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, I'd like to begin with a parochial matter. Section 6403 B1 of the middle class tax relief and job creation act specifies that the commission may, subject to international (inaudible) along the border with Mexico and Canada, reassign and relocate and reallocate broadcast frequencies. Is that correct?

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Now Chairman Wheeler, in the commission's joy (ph) to 2013 response to my letter of inquiry about the reverse auction, Gary Epstein, head of the commission's incentive auction taskforce stated the following, the language used in section 6403 B1 of the action is quote, identical to that used by the commission in describing its handling of the earlier DTV transition, in which the commission adopted our proposed allotments for these statements, subject to our continuing negotiations with Canada, notwithstanding the broadcaster's request.

To the contrary, one here could reasonably assume, based on the statement, that the commission may reassign and reallocate broadcast frequencies pursuant to the act, while negotiations with Canada and Mexico are still ongoing. Is that correct?

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: I'm going to ask you to submit for the record how you're going to assure protection to the broadcasters and the viewers in that process.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Now Mr. Wheeler, does the commission believe that concluding negotiations with Canada and Mexico, prior to commencing the reverse action, will give broadcasters, particularly in border regions, greater certainties and likely to increase the unwillingness to participate in this auction? Yes, or no?

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Wheeler, does the commission expect to conclude negotiations with Canada and Mexico prior to commencing the reverse action next year? Yes, or no?

WHEELER: The expectation is it is the goal.

DINGELL: You may not make it, is what you're saying.

WHEELER: It is -- it is the goal, and as we -- as I answered you in your previous point ...

DINGELL: Would you notify -- would you notify this committee as soon as that becomes likely or dangerous?

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: Now in this matter, Mr. Chairman, I'd like to state for the record that it's my understanding, based on exchange with counsel at the energy and commerce subcommittee on communications and technology, December 1, 2011, markup of the border of the act, that border negotiations are to be completed before the commission reassigns broadcast channels.

I hope that Chairman Wheeler will honor that understanding. I hope, Mr. Chairman, you understand I have great apprehensions about that, because of the impact it should have on the broadcast, and also on my constituents.

WHEELER: Mr. Chairman, this is -- I share your deep concern about this, not only because of the very legitimate concern you have about your constituents and other Americans getting service along the border, but also the candlevering (ph) effect, if you will, as it then -- as spectrum allocation then goes into the middle of the country.

I can assure you this is an incredibly high priority. I can also assure you that our Canadian colleagues have been very forthcoming and very helpful ...

DINGELL: I would like to have this submitted for the record in response to correspondence. Now, Mr. Chairman, I note that the commission proposes to use a method called quote, scoring, to set individual prices for each broadcast station participation -- or participating in the reverse auction. Is that correct?

WHEELER: It is one of the things we're considering ...

DINGELL: One ...

WHEELER: We have not made the final decision yet.

DINGELL: There are others?

WHEELER: There -- we're looking at others ...

DINGELL: I'm going to ask that you submit, in response to correspondence, a proper answer on that ...

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

DINGELL: ... particular point. Now, Chairman Wheeler, is the commission concerned that scoring, as opposed to competitive bidding, will decrease broadcasters willingness to participate in the reverse auction? Yes, or no?

WHEELER: No.

DINGELL: Now Chairman Wheeler, in general, do you intend to work in good faith with broadcasters as the commission defines the rules for reverse auction in order to situate (ph) that their needs are met, as the action (ph) specifies -- as the act specifies, to the best of your abilities? Yes, or no?

WHEELER: Absolutely.

DINGELL: I want to quote Admiral Rickrover (ph), who once observed, the devil's in the details, but so is salvation. I'm hoping you're going to see that the salvation is there and not just that we are going to find ourselves amidst trouble because of carelessness, not by you, but by some of your over-enthusiastic and less-than- competent predecessors. I thank you, Mr. Chairman. I yield my time.

WALDEN: The gentleman's time has expired, and has yielded back. The chair now recognizes the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Shimkus for five minutes.

SHIMKUS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and Chairman Wheeler, welcome. I'm going to try to get through three pretty quick points if I can. As you know, there's a lot of concerns on this side of the dials (ph) and this Title II debate ...

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

SHIMKUS: ... and -- and the basic premise is how do you -- for me, is how do you build out? You want -- we want more, not less. Does a regulated monopoly incentivize more build out, more pipelines, or does a competitive, capital-intensive, incentivized, market-driven process?

I believe the second. So that's -- we've gone from copper, to cable -- collective (ph) cable, satellite, cellular, fiber, a lot of different ways for data to now flow. And we want to encourage that.

And I don't -- I think only -- I kind of like the idea of incentivizing people who want to use more, making them pay more, to incentivize those who carry, someone may want to build out more. That's kind of where I come from. My position is more pipes, not less, more pipes not regulated pipe, competitive markets versus controlled markets.

So because here's an example of that -- a recent -- on May 16th, the Wireline Competition Bureau released a public notice seeking comment on state regulation of dial-up internet traffic. Dial-up. I mean that's a dinosaur. It's hardly used.

So there's -- there is no -- you want to talk about uncertainty for the state and for the providers, when we're still in this process, more than 15 years after the SEC first discussed the treatment of dial-up, we're -- we're now to this process? So that's just kind of a statement. That doesn't create certainty. Would you -- would you agree?

WHEELER: Well what we're trying to do, Mr. Shimkus, is to -- is to create an environment that assures consumers and those who rely on the internet that there is openness, while at the same point in time, encouraging investment.

SHIMKUS: Well let's just go back. I get that, but does that -- this is dial-up.

WHEELER: We still -- so if we're dealing with the dial-up -- I mean that's really -- that's a -- that's a different topic ...

SHIMKUS: Well it is, but it's not, because it's -- it's the whole debate about certainty, and if -- we actually have a dinosaur application, then why are we even ...

WHEELER: So we still have 40 percent of our consumers on dial-up telephone lines. One of the challenges that we have is how do we evolve that into an all IP environment, which would be, you know, an internet-like environment.

And one of the things that I have -- I have said to this committee is that we believe that this IP transition is a crucial part in how do we ...

SHIMKUS: OK, I get it, I'm going to try to (inaudible) ...

WHEELER: OK, sorry, sir.

SHIMKUS: In one deals in both of our sweet spot is kind of the public service, 9-11, the spectromac (ph) call for the creation of the do not call registry, and the automatic dialing issue. The commission keeps saying there's not enough money to do this.

I would ask you to check into that. I think there's a lot of money in the FCC. And because obviously this automatic dialing freezes up lines, and it's a public safety concern, and I would hope that we would work together to try to -- you would take that into consideration.

WHEELER: I would take a look forward to that. Let me -- let me get back, and I will come to ...

SHIMKUS: And you know, myself and the ranking member have been better (ph) involved in this issue, as you have in -- in the early days also. The last thing I want to -- from rural America, is kind of just there seems to be a de facto freeze on this shared service agreement.

And this isn't a broadcast sector, as you know. The local -- when you represent a third of the state of Illinois, as I do now, 33 counties, these shared agreements are now helping to provide, and we've got real-world cases, better local service to the local folks, than -- than less.

And I guess the basic question in my last minute is what's your plan to ensure that FDAC (ph) action on television transfer application is predictable, consistent, fair, and timely?

WHEELER: So -- thank you, Mr. Shimkus. What we -- what we have done, is to put out a public notice on how we look at transfers. And I consider this to be a procedural reform. Because the way it used to be, was broadcasters would -- would -- would come together in some kind of a -- a -- a merger situation, and they would come to the commission, which was a black box, that had constantly changing, well, this we'll look at it this way, we'll look at it that way.

And what I wanted to do was to say OK, what are the things that we will look at? So that everybody has notice, everybody understands, and it is not a black box. And that's the process that we have now established to be able to make those kinds of decisions.

SHIMKUS: Thank you. I know my time has expired. I appreciate it if you'd keep me in mind as these things move forward, it would be helpful.

WHEELER: Yes, sir. Thank you.

WALDEN: The chair now recognizes the gentlelady from Colorado, Ms. DeGette, for five minutes.

DEGETTE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I want to follow up, Chairman Wheeler, on this discussion about the open internet NPRM (ph). Leading up to the commission's vote last week, there was a robust public exchange among ISPs, and edge (ph) providers, and others, about the impact of paid prioritization on their business models. And as Ms. Matsui said, we've been hearing from a lot of our constituents about this as well.

Now you talked very briefly about -- a few minutes ago, about what the FCC is doing in its review process to look at the effect of paid prioritization on consumers' broadband bills. Wondering if you can comment about what you think the proposed open internet rules will have on access to new and innovative content online. Because that's one reason why we're concerned about these proposed rules.

WHEELER: The -- it should be encouragement of new and innovative programming, because of the fact that it assures that they will be able to reach the consumer, unfettered, and without having to pay special fees.

DEGETTE: And what impact do you think that the rules will have on average broadband speeds, network investments, and overall quality of service?

WHEELER: That's a terrific question ...

DEGETTE: Thank you.

WHEELER: ... I'm glad you asked it. You know, one of the fascinating things is that 2010, when the open internet rules were first proposed, since then, there has been hundreds of millions of dollars of broadband investment made. So the rules don't seem to have a chilling effect. And, speeds have been doing this, going up. And this is what the court was talking about when they talk about this virtuous cycle because everything -- in the internet ecosystem everything adds to everything else.

DEGETTE: So what do you think that the new rules, what effect will they have on these issues?

WHEELER: I believe ...

DEGETTE: You just talked about what's been happening...

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: Yes, we believe that the rules that we have designed will continue to encourage investment in broadband, continue to encourage increases in throughput and as a result continue to encourage innovation from edge providers.

DEGETTE: And so are you saying also that average broadband speeds will increase?

WHEELER: Yes ma'am.

DEGETTE: And overall quality of service will increase?

WHEELER: Yes ma'am, they'll need to.

DEGETTE: All right. OK, one last thing no one has raised yet, is the issue of industry consolidation. And this year we've seen two major merger proposals in the telecom industry. Now clearly the industry's going through a period of significant technological and economic change. And some folks think that consolidation is the best approach to this. So all things being equal, do you think industry consolidation is good or bad for the consumers?

WHEELER: So, I read the other day that we are probably the -- in the last decade the biggest year for telecom mergers and what we're doing is opening a record on each of them. And we'll make that decision based on the record that is developed for each...

DEGETTE: ...So you don't have an opinion at this point?

WHEELER: I don't want to prejudge the record.

DEGETTE: OK. And as you know congress has recognized the importance and unique character of the telecommunications marketplace by giving the FCC the authority to review mergers under the public interest standard. Do you think the conditions the FCC placed on the Comcast/NBCU merger were effective at promoting the public interest?

WHEELER: Oh, wow, you know, that is something that -- a decision that my predecessor made. I know that it had impact. My goal is to look at the record that we have presented before me and my colleagues and make a decision on those.

DEGETTE: Do you think it promoted the public interest? Yes or no.

WHEELER: I think that there were multiple things in it that promoted the public interest.

DEGETTE: And what other lessons do you take away from commissions previous attempts to promote the public interests by placing conditions on mergers as you go forward?

WHEELER: That it is an important role that the commission has. You know, there is a lot of discussion as to why should there be any authority of the FCC to look at public interest obligations.

DEGETTE: Right.

WHEELER: I strongly believe that there is a big difference between the kind of statutory rigidity that the justice department is required to look at mergers with and the kind of broader public interest issues that you've raised that the statute asked the FCC to look at.

DEGETTE: Chairman, I just asked if you could supplement your testimony with some specific takeaways that this has given you. Thank you very much. Thanks Mr. Chairman.

WALDEN: Gentlady yields back. The chair now recognizes -- I'm sorry the chair recognizes the Chairman.

(UNKNOWN): I just wanted to clarify one thing to make sure I heard it right. Did you say 40 percent of Americans are still using dial-up for internet access?

WHEELER: No, I'm talking about dial-up phone service writ large.

(UNKNOWN): OK because I was saying it's more like 3 percent.

WHEELER: No, dial-up phone service writ large.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you. And I thank the courtesy of the chair.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you for clarifying that, sir.

WALDEN: Thank you.

The chair now recognizes the gentleman from Nebraska for five minutes Mr. Terry.

TERRY: Thank you. It's good to know that my 82-year-old father is in the 3 percent, that makes him very elite. I'm trying to talk him out of that, but that's a...

(CROSSTALK).

WHEELER: I remember the days when we were thrilled to get 56kb, right?

TERRY: Yes.

So switching gears just a little bit. I wanna ask about quintile (ph) aggression analysis progress and I do think that you have probably captured its deficiencies better than anyone else has and I appreciate that work. I was glad to see the commission's follow-up by repealing the QRA formula.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

TERRY: So congratulations, I appreciate that. I'm curious on your thoughts of how it should be replaced and if you could walk me through what factors are going to be used in any decision making and time tables and process.

WHEELER: I respect the question, but I can't really answer it right now because we're in the process of -- there's several proposals and we're in the process of looking at what the best components of each are. And I don't want to hip shoot here, but we do have proceedings underway to say, OK, what is it we will replace QRA with?

TERRY: So, where are we within the process of those?

WHEELER: I think that we're probably heading into something that you would see before fall.

TERRY: Before fall?

(UNKNOWN): Early fall, football season.

TERRY: Well, I don't want to get distracted.

WHEELER: Well if you joined the big team.

TERRY: Do that when we McNeese State and I would appreciate that.

WHEELER: Yes sir.

TERRY: For the rest of you, that was humor. Now then let me go to a broadcast question since we succinctly dealt with one I thought would take all of five minutes. The spectrum deal that was authorized in incentive auctions and passed through the committee was a bipartisan bill and unfortunately the order removed the FCC was not bipartisan. And some commissioners, particularly republicans, stated that the order treats (ph) TV broadcasters that choose not to participate in the auctions unfairly and that has me concerned.

Congress set aside the 1.75 to reimburse broadcasters for us to move part of the incentive option in the range to fully recover their expenses. Why did the FCC not adopt the number as its repacking budget and ensure that broadcasters would not have to go out of pocket when forced to the FCC to move?

WHEELER: Thank you. Congress said a billion 750 million is the max that can be spent on repacking. We think that will be sufficient. There have been broadcasters who have expressed a concern that it might not be sufficient. So we have said, OK, we don't think that's going to happen, but we will put in place a process that will have a structure in place if and when that should happen. Sir, I don't expect that we're going to get there.

TERRY: All right. I'll just yield back my time. Thank you, sir.

WHEELER: The gentleman yields back and the chair now recognizes the gentleman from Utah, Mr. Matheson for five minutes.

MATHESON: Thanks Mr. Chairman and Mr. Wheeler thanks for your testimony. I appreciate your candor and your articulate way you answer questions.

WHEELER: Thank you, sir.

MATHESON: I also want to commend you on your efforts to open up more spectrum for our license uses. The FCC took an important step last month by opening up the 100 gigahertz for spectrum for unlicensed uses in the 5 gigahertz band and I'm pleased to see in your testimony that the FCC is actively participating in an ongoing effort to free up additional unlicensed spectrum in the 5 gigahertz band. Can you provide an update on where things currently stand with resolving the technical issues in the ITS band currently used for vehicle-to-vehicle communications and the parts of the band used by the DOD for military radar?

WHEELER: Yes. So, as we talked, there's three slices to 5 gigahertz.

MATHESON: Right.

WHEELER: There's lower slice that we took care of. The middle, as you suggest, is DOD. We are having ongoing discussions with them. I have been personally involved in those discussions about a wide range of spectrum issues including this. There are strongly held beliefs on both sides, sir. I continue to believe, however, that people of good faith can find answers if you sit at the table long enough, and that's the goal.

And so far as the high band in 5 gig, yes, that's intelligent transportation, which offers such great opportunities with Google Smart Card and all this sort of thing. The thing that's really encouraging is that that's an 802 type of standard. It's not a dissimilar reality, however. Where we need to make sure that people are sitting around the table looking for commonalities rather than looking for differences.

MATHESON: Something we got to do around congress a little.

WHEELER: You have a little experience.

(CROSSTALK)

WHEELER: But that's the goal of what we're trying to do here.

MATHESON: Do you have a sense of what the -- do you have a timeframe for when this additional spectrum could be freed up?

WHEELER: I wish I did. I would be misleading you, sir, if I gave you a date right now.

MATHESON: I understand. Another issue I wanted to mention. The administrations ConnectED program, the goal to bring 100 megabit broadband to every school in the US. To the extent that this initiative is implemented through the ERAY (ph) program, what can the commission do to maximize efficiency and get the most bang for their buck?

WHEELER: Wow, thank you. Great question. There are multiple challenges in that. One is that we need to spend our money, the people's money, on 21st Century high-speed broadband solutions not 20th century solutions like dial-up telephone service and a long distance. Right now about half of the $2 billion, $2.4 billion that's being spent is spent for old stuff. Not today, half today (ph). Second part is that we have to design a system that helps schools and library administrators find their way through the maze that is telecom.

I mean, we put them in those jobs to educate students, not to be telecom wizzes. So we're trying to develop a process that says, you know, here's what you ought to be paying. Here's what somebody next door is paying. Here's like situated, so that they can go in and understand where they're bargaining positioning is.

We're going to be talking about being able to have longer contracts because buying it on a monthly basis, as we all know, is the worst way to buy. So let's talk about several years. We're going to be encouraging concertia (ph) so that you can buy in bulk and get better prices. And I just think that there are a myriad of things that we can do to get more efficiency out of the existing bucks, and we intend to do that.

MATHESON: That's great. Does the FCC plan on using the national broadband map to identify fiber that is already in place in a given community so it can be leveraged toward these ConnectED (ph) goal?

WHEELER: Absolutely and we have now taken over the ownership of the broadband map, so yes, sir.

MATHESON: OK, I appreciate that. I will yield back, Mr. Chairman.

WHEELER: Thank you very much. The gentleman yields back balance of time and the chair now recognizes the gentleman from New Jersey, Mr. Lance for five minutes.

LANCE: Thank you very much and good afternoon to you. I believe that some of my colleagues on the other side of the aisle would prefer a title 2 reclassification. And if the commission were to decide to proceed in that direction, I'm concerned that it might trigger a lot of ill-fitting regulations that might not make sense in the context of these services. In your opinion, Chairman, would the process of going through forbearance to separate the wheat from the chaff, could it be a messy exercise and might it lead to more years of litigation and uncertainty is my real concern, sir?

WHEELER: Thank you, Congressman. That's one of the things that gets teed up in the imperium (ph) when we ask about title 2 versus section 706. And I presume that that will be exhaustively discussed in the responses. And that's exactly the kind of questions that we're asking.

LANCE: Thank you. One concern has been raised about the proposed net totality rule making process protections that would be afforded companies use a carrier that's providing the same service as another carrier. For example, the large carriers are beginning to bundle services that go well beyond phone service, the internet and television, to include smart phone services such as temperature control, home health monitoring, which of course is important to another subcommittee of this committee, as well as alarm services such as monitoring of home intrusions and fires, video surveillance or personal emerge response systems. What protections will the FCC provide to ensure that the carrier does not give its service provider a preference over a company using them as a broad-based carrier?

WHEELER: I'm not sure I exactly understand. What your concern is will there be preferences among providers of those services?

LANCE: Yes, Chairman.

WHEELER: That's contrary to the concept of an open internet.

LANCE: So, you can assure us as the American people that that will not be the case as these other services are provided moving forward?

WHEELER: Let me give you an example personally.

LANCE: Yes, sir.

WHEELER: I just switched out ADT in my home security system for another company. And I was able to access both of them over the internet and both of them over my mobile device and there should be no interference with my ability to move from ADT to the other provider.

LANCE: Thank you, and that's the goal of the commission and you will assure us that that is how you will proceed moving forward?

WHEELER: There needs to be open access for all providers.

LANCE: Thank you. I look forward to working with you. I understand you're a proud graduate of Ohio State, is that?

WHEELER: You bet, yes, sir.

LANCE: Please be gentle with Rutgers now that Rutgers has entered the big, whatever it is, the big 16 or whatever it is.

WHEELER: It's the big 10 that can't count.

LANCE: The big 10 that can't count. I defer back to the Chairman the balance of my time, a proud representative from Ohio.

WHEELER: Well thank you very much. For the gentlemen yielding back his balance of his time. The chair now recognizes the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. Butterfield for 5 minutes.

BUTTERFIELD: Thank you very much gentlemen for yielding time and thank you to you Chairman for your service and thank you for your testimony today. I especially thank you for your clarity. I told you that the first time that I met you and whenever I hear you speak it is unambiguous. At least until the subject of your home security system comes up and you are a little ambiguous with who the new provider is but thank you so very much.

Mr. Chairman in the communications act congress mandated that the commission ensured diverse participation in media and telecom and that includes participation in minority and women own businesses. The quote from the statue basically says that the mandate is to promote economic opportunity and competition by disseminating licenses among a wide variety of applicants including small businesses, rural telecoms and businesses owned by members of minority groups and women. End of quote.

It seems to me that the response of the commission to judicial criticism of the FCCs inaction in this area and the lack of meaningful study and progress as well as the low level of minority of women on participation and media and telecom licensing that the commission seems to me is not committed to these diversity goals. And if I am wrong about this, I would ask that you correct me.

On May the 14th, members of the congressional black caucus including Congressman Rush and myself addressed these concerns -- these diversity concerns in a letter to you. I suppose the letter may not have made its way to your desk yet, but I ask that you look at it very carefully when you do. Question, what precisely do you need beyond the congressional directions and judicial criticism to get the commission to make progress in creating opportunities for diverse communities.

WHEELER: Thank you, Congressman, and I got the letter this morning, so thank you. First of all, I agree that we have a mandate to have a broad swath of opportunity for all Americans to participate in all aspects of telecommunications. I can assure you that that's a goal of mine. Now let's talk about some specifics.

Number one, I think what we did on the JSAs in the broadcast space actually opens up opportunities for minority and small operators. That's why it was supported by more than a dozen representative minority groups. Secondly is, we are going to move on the AWS3 (ph) auction to make sure that there are appropriate steps taken to assure that minorities can participate through waivers in other kinds of processes in that auction. Thirdly, we are going to have -- and I should pause and in all of these call out Commissioner Clyburn, who has been the constant pusher on all of these issues.

There will be designated envy rules for the incentive auction that will create bidding credits for appropriate designated entities. And I very much take to heart both as an institutional responsibility and as a personal responsibility the language that you read.

BUTTERFIELD: And so when the spectrum is auctioned you are making a commitment that diversity will be an overriding concern of the commission?

WHEELER: What we want to do is make sure that there are opportunities for designated entities to get bidding credits to that, for instance, they can bid with 75 cent dollars against AT&T and Verizon's 100 cent dollars.

BUTTERFIELD: Let me get this last one in if I can. In light of the demographic changes of caring in our country and the growing numbers of mergers in the communications industry, how is the commission encouraging companies to partner with diverse businesses in the secondary market?

WHEELER: We have been doing that in both formally and informally, that there are great opportunities when there are transactions for minority companies. They, you know, grain telecom comes to mind, which is now operating spectrum I believe for both AT&T and Verizon, which they purchased as a part of some settlements with the commission. And those kind of opportunities are important and worthwhile. I also believe that there can be new opportunities in the broadcast space particularly after the auction in terms of being able to share spectrum and offer other kinds of services.

BUTTERFIELD: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

WHEELER: Thank you very much. The chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Guthrie.

GUTHRIE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you for coming today. I know you had a busy week so your time is appreciated. My colleague from California Ms. Matsui have spent a lot of time on spectrum issues and we've founded a congressional spectrum caucus and -- and looking for different ideas on how we can move forward on that spectrum.

And I appreciate the efforts that you've done to move the incentive auction forward. And have a couple of questions about the guard bands and the 680 megahertz band. It appears to me that the band plan for spectrum cleared in the broadcast incentive auction carefully considered the importance of maximizing license spectrum and adhered to the technically reasonable standards set by congress for creating a duplex gap. And I applaud the commission for this area in this regard. Quick two questions, one how do you foresee going forward with unlicensed spectrum in the duplex gap? As you know it would be important for those who bid on adjacent license spectrum to have as sure there will not be interference and are you confident the FCC will have technical guidelines to have assurance for those who bid for license spectrum there will be no interference in the duplex gap from our lines (ph)?

WHEELER: Yes, sir. The answer to both you just identified technical standards. And so for instance we're going to have technical standards proceeding for wireless mics and others who would be using the unlicensed spectrums, so yes, sir.

GUTHRIE: OK, and we've been using social media to reach out to interest Americans and so we're here for representing the American people and one came from Kelly on Facebook and Kelly asked this question -- well Kelly submitted this question through Facebook who would like to ask the question about your plans for future spectrum policy and can you give Kelly a brief answer to her question about why just broadly future spectrum policy?

WHEELER: Thank you Kelly. The answer is that, you know, they're not making it no more and so what we have to do -- I believe that we are today on the cusp of the new Verizon on spectrum policy with two things that we are doing. One is the incentive auction that you all created. Because when you boil everything down it ultimately comes to economics. And if you can address the other person's economics you can probably go along with solving your economics issue. And that's what the auction does.

The other component is spectrum sharing. And the days of hearing this is all yours who uses it are over and fortunately digital allows that kind of sharing. You know, think about going into a Starbucks and everybody is sharing that Wi-Fi spectrum. You put those two together and that's I think the answer to Kelly's question as to where is spectrum policy going. And we're in the middle of making both of those work right now, which is why what we're doing is so terribly important.

GUTHRIE: Yes, I often use the metaphor there's a very simple metaphor compared to a complex physics in this, but we don't have special highways for ambulances or fire trucks, we get out of the way when they need to go down the highway. So sharing that's kind of a simple way to look at the metaphor. There's in one of your statements and I'm putting my hate as a former state legislature so I was the Senator in Kentucky before here and there's been some concerns of places like Utah and Oregon where there's been municipal broadband deployed and the project have failed and there's (ph) were their competitive providers and these projects have resulted in putting millions of dollars in municipal bonds, property taxes, selling franchise taxes at risk and I believe the I probo (ph) sold to Google for a dollar and leaving city tax payers on the hook repaying tens of millions of dollars.

My understanding is five states or so have passed laws saying that cities can't do this -- because the states usually something happens to the city the states kind of on the hook for it as well and I believe in your prepared your written testimony you said that you believe the FCC could do perimption (ph) over this area in the state law and I just wanted you to clarify that. And why you think Washington could have a better view of this than Frankfurt, for example, in Kentucky.

WHEELER: So there are about 20 states that have put some kind of restrictions in place. And I see it through just exactly the opposite end of the telescope with all due respect, that if the citizens of a community want to organize through their local government to say to bring competition in broadband provision, they should not be inhibited.

GUTHRIE: No. They inhibit it by their elected...

WHEELER: They should not be inhibited by the fact that the incumbents have been urging the adoption of legislation that would ban it. And if we believe in competition, we ought to let competition flourished.

So what I have said is that I'm following again Judge Silverman's comments in his dissent nonetheless in the open internet case in which he said, "If there's ever an example where 706 would apply, it is in the ability to -- to say the States, 'You cannot get in the middle of this virtuous cycle and prohibit consumers from being able to have access to a competitive service'".

GUTHRIE: So -- so your perception is that government should be doing that because of the incumbents or because they don't want to be on the hook for an I-provoke-type situation.

WHEELER: So the -- I go back to first principles with -- that is this is a decision that ought to be made by the people of the community. And that that if they want to take the risk, if they own it themselves, but you don't have to own it yourself.

It is also -- the gentleman from Utah has left. But for instance in Utah, there's a group of cities that have banded together to -- to solicit bids for somebody else to own that they would have a participation in.

That kind of structure -- if the people say that's what we want; this -- we want this kind of competition, then I think they ought to be encouraged together. And competition has clearly been shown to be the best tool.

GUTHRIE: Well, I don't disagree with you on that. But my time actually has expired. I know that Chairman's ready to gobble me down, so I yield back. Thank you.

WALDEN: Thank you very much. The -- the Chairman would never do that to the gentleman from Kentucky. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Vermont, Mr. Welch.

WELCH: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Wheeler, I have five questions. We have five minutes so we can go look at this split.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

WELCH: First thing, Bob Latta and I started the Rural Caucus. We so appreciated you coming an enormous concern in rural America that we get access to the internet. It's essential for our future. That neutrality is a big deal. That's the big topic. You've been getting comments.

There's an enormous amount of concern that if we make the wrong decision, the big guys are gonna get the fast lane, the little guys - many in rural America are gonna get the breakdown lane.

Can you give us some reassurance that at the end of this process, we're gonna have access, on equal terms, for folks in rural America to the internet?

WHEELER: You want a quick answer? Yes.

WELCH: Yes.

WHEELER: Yes.

WELCH: And that's a full sentence. You can give a full sentence to reassure all of us especially rural America...

WHEELER: There should...

WELCH: That we're gonna be driving in the fast lane.

WHEELER: There should not -- there is one internet. There is not a fast internet; there is not a slow internet. There is not an urban internet; there is not a rural internet. There is one internet. Everybody ought to have open equal access to the capacity delivered by the internet.

WELCH: Okay. Thank you. Now, getting the internet, rural America is spread out, and the investors want to put their money where they can make the money. We all understand that. That was true for electricity. But we've got to get that internet out into rural America so we can be part of the modern economy.

And we have a Universal Service Fund with the -- with the Mobility Fund, whereas we need to have that. And I'm wondering if you could comment on the status of that and what we need to do to make sure that the funds are there to build out that broadband.

WHEELER: Specifically on the Mobility. Here's the interesting question that gets raised by Mobility. Broadband wireless is LTE. It is being built out across America. Recently just one of the major carriers announced a new initiative in rural America with LTE.

The question becomes, that we're wrestling with, is should we subsidize something if it's already happening? And that prudent fiscal responsibilities suggest probably not.

WELCH: Well, I got three more questions.

WHEELER: OK.

WELCH: So we wanna work with you on that to make it rational and not have us investing on things that aren't working but invest in things that are going to help rural America gets the best.

WHEELER: That's true. That's -- that's what we're trying to get to.

WELCH: All right. Third, we've got to work with you and your entire Commission, the Republicans and the Democrats. And when you came into our rural working group, you explained a couple of problems you had each in IT and also procedures where I guess it's easier to hire a lawyer...

WHEELER: Yeah.

WELCH: Than an engineer.

WHEELER: Yes.

WELCH: I'm a lawyer so maybe I'd like that, but I wouldn't be very much use to you. What are the things that this committee can advocate to help your entire Commission, Rs&Ds who want to do the job so you have the tools you need to do it?

WHEELER: Thank you for asking. Our IT infrastructure is worthy of this Masonian. I came from a business background. The things that you cannot do is -- that are common sense in the business world. The fact that we're still using computers that have known cyber risks associated with them. The fact that we can't organize a consumer complaint process online for American consumers because our IT system isn't up to us -- up to it is ridiculous.

So, we have serious problems there on the issue of lawyers versus engineers. Far be it for me to take a side on that but we do need more engineers, sir.

WELCH: OK. Thank you.

WHEELER: And economists.

WELCH: Right.

WHEELER: And economists.

WELCH: Well, I'd like our committee to work with you on that. Next, Section 706. There's a lot of concern about whether you have the sufficient authority under that section in order to give you the rulemaking power to guarantee the outcome being net neutrality. Can you comment on that? Do you still feel that that is sufficient and the court gave you a roadmap forward?

WHEELER: I think -- I think that we do have sufficient authority and then when the court talked about this virtuous cycle and they said, "Anything that interferers with that virtuous cycle is a violation of 706", that that is a very broad grant of authority.

WELCH: OK. My last question in 26 seconds. Retrans consent and blocking online content, we've seen that in the broadcast area where there's a dispute and people can't get access to the signal. Now, that's starting to migrate into the online content. Is this the beginning of the cabalization of the internet?

WHEELER: Sir, I think it is the right question. Our authority goes to the -- retransmission and program access goes to the authority of good faith negotiations. I think there is reason to be concerned when because I happen to subscribe to an ISP who is in a dispute with a program provider. That the program provider blocks all access from all IP addresses coming from that ISP. I think that is something that is -- is -- is of concern and that we all should worry about.

WELCH: Okay. I yield back. Thank you very much, Mr. Wheeler.

WHEELER: Thank you, sir.

WALDEN: Thank you very much. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Kansas, Mr. Pompeo.

POMPEO: Thank you, Mr. WALDEN: Thank you for being here today. I don't want to spend a lot of time on net neutrality. We have different view. I view it is nothing more than a price control. I think we've seen how that works in creating supply. And so I think -- I think it's a very dangerous path that you're headed down.

I do want to ask a couple of process questions related to that. Have you spoken to anyone at the White House or OMB in the last month regarding net neutrality?

WHEELER: Only to keep them appraised. They have been assiduous in their recognition that we are an independent agency.

POMPEO: And did you call them or did they call you?

WHEELER: I called them.

POMPEO: And has anyone else on your staff spoken to folks at the White House or OMB in the last month?

WHEELER: Not in my...

POMPEO: With this issue?

WHEELER: Well, on -- the answer is I'm sure. On -- on this issue, I don't know but I can assure you from my discussions with everybody, from the President on down, the recognition of the independence of our agency; and I'll go further and assure you that never have I or to my knowledge anyone of my staff felt any pressure to decide any issue.

POMPEO: I appreciate that. Thank you. I want to follow-up on something. Representative Guthrie was saying you believe the FCC has the power to preempt state law to ban competition from community broadband.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

POMPEO: Under Section 706.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

POMPEO: Do you believe that State have the same authority.

WHEELER: I think that's the -- the issue that I believe is do we have the authority to preempt. That raises the question of what is the authority of the State. And I think that we have preempt authority. I think we'll probably end up having this answered in court.

POMPEO: Wait, look. I -- I just read the statute that they have the same authority that the -- the FCC does. The language is identical. It says you would have authority as you have in that.

WHEELER: Well, it says State Commissions.

POMPEO: Right.

WHEELER: If you will. Yes. And -- and it says that we have -- we have preemptory authority over State Commissions.

POMPEO: So State Commissions have the same authority that you do. Do you agree with that?

WHEELER: Don't I?

POMPEO: That's a simple statute, I mean it says the same thing I just said.

WHEELER: No I think that I -- I think that it says that that -- that both of us have authority, but that we have preemptory authority on this issue. And I think that's what Judge Silverman was saying in his dissent in that Verizon...

POMPEO: Great. Not all dissent. Chairman, will the FCC's Media Bureau recently issued new, they call them "Processing Guidelines for Broadcast Transactions"; and this broadcast talks not only about future broadcast transactions but also pending applications. I have three questions with respect to that.

First, how many applications have been singled out for a closed scrutiny since that new guidelines have been issued? How many have been approved in those two months? And when might those broadcasters see the resolution of their applications?

WHEELER: I don't know the answer to any of -- of those three for the -- off top of my head. But I'll be happy to get it for -- get it for you for the record.

POMPEO: OK. You can understand these are pending applications submitted under the set of rules. You've now moved the goalpost on them. This is -- this is...

WHEELER: No, actually, I -- yes, sir, I understand your point. What we're trying to do is not move the goalpost but to open up the process so that everybody knows...

POMPEO: But that's what you did.

WHEELER: ...what the rules are.

POMPEO: But that's what you did. I mean you changed -- you changed the rules with respect to applications already submitted under preexisting set of standards. So, and I don't know how you could describe that as anything but moving the goalpost.

WHEELER: With all respect, sir. We had -- we had a series of transactions that were in placed. And in the decisions on those transactions, we said, note, "Going forward, there will be a new look at what financial structures are in transactions", not in these transactions that we're approving.

Then we put out a public notice that said, "Here is how we are going to open up this black box and here is what is gonna be going on." And it is that standard. So there was -- there was notice as a part of a decision that was not affected. Then there was notice through a public notice. And now those that they -- the Bureau is reviewing are subject to both of those.

POMPEO: And my last 20 seconds. And with net neutrality, there are also cyber security issues. Do you plan to explicitly give network providers liability protections in their efforts to protect their network from cyber security as part of your rulemaking and --for net neutrality.

WHEELER: It was not considered as a part of the rulemaking to have -- have that.

POMPEO: All right. Mr. Chairman, I yield back my time.

WALDEN: Thank you very much. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from New Mexico, Mr. Lujan.

LUJAN: Mr. Chairman, thank you very much. Chairman, we thank you so much...

WHEELER: Mr. Lujan.

LUJAN: ...for being here as well. Chairman Wheeler, two weeks ago, this committee added my amendment calling on the FCC to conduct a study on reforming the designated market area system to the STELA Reauthorization Bill.

As you know, DMAs are currently defined by a map drawn by Nielsen, a for-profit marketing research company based upon the reach of television broadcast antennas. This kind of work of antennas is based upon technology deployed back in the '40s and '50s. Americans could have a multitude of viewing options via technology such as cable, broadband and wireless internet. But current DMA rules prevent the viewership of much of that content.

I believe that a system embraced by these technologies could revitalize television broadcasting with new affiliates reaching viewers who have more in common than their placement on Nielsen's old map.

It is my hope that the Commission takes this study seriously and bring the policy into the 21st century, Mr. Chairman. So I hope that we might be able to work...

WHEELER: Thank you for your leadership on this, Mr. Lujan. And that I assure you that we will take it seriously.

LUJAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And Mr. Chairman, it wasn't too long ago that a company would not allow access to another companies upside. There was a question a few years ago with AT&T and FaceTime, an Apple product.

WHEELER: Yes, sir.

LUJAN: As I talked about fixed versus mobile. They defended it by saying it was allowed under the FCC's net neutrality rules granted this was under 3G.

Section 62 of the proposal suggests no -- no blocking rule -- that sorry, the no blocking rule was applied to different standard to mobile broadband internet access and mobile internet access service was excluded from the unreasonable discrimination rules. We're seeing mobile getting fast -- faster now and with the new spectrum options, even faster than fixed.

I appreciate and I agree with you that we're talking about one internet with open and equal access. With my colleagues in rural areas, I shared with you before that there's a conversation about taking phone calls and with bandwidth capabilities as well as streaming of content on airplanes. In rural America, we should be able to get the same treatment. I do not understand why we're not there yet. But nonetheless, it's common.

So I'm hopeful that as we have this conversation that we're able to have equitable treatment. I know that there is a, as I read in the proposal, that there is elements of asking for a look into this...

WHEELER: Right.

LUJAN: ... in the rule. But I'm certainly hopeful that this will be treated with the same scrutiny and level of attention. And again, as I talk about an old antiquated rule within the '40s and '50s, we talked about dial-up, that this is another area that we're going to have equitable treatment as well especially with new gigabit access as well.

Mr. Chairman, in another area, I know that there's a number of my colleagues who join me in their concern for recent reports of interconnection deals particularly the one between Comcast and Netflix. You stated that peering is not a net neutrality issue, there is a matter of the -- that there is a matter of the open internet and there is a matter of the internet connection among the various disparate pathways that become the internet.

Well, I understand that net neutrality refers only to the behavior of internet service providers blocking or throttling the speeds of certain websites. My question is how is an interconnection agreement that essentially throttles content substantially different?

WHEELER: So, thank you. So that's -- that's a very good question. They -- you can -- you can think of the internet in -- in three parts. There is the -- well, actually four parts. There is somebody like Netflix getting on the internet and then writing so- called middle mile providers to a peering point which is just a fancy word for interconnection where they then have access to Comcast Verizon, whoever the case maybe.

The consumer buys from their computer up to the peering point. Traditionally, peering has been I'll take mine, you take yours, back and forth kind of a thing; and -- and -- and for free. That has begun to change overtime.

LUJAN: If I may apologize, my time has been elapsed, so maybe what I'll do is if we could get that into the record. All that I would add is once upon a time peering agreements didn't have an exchange of money. People find a way to...

WHEELER: Exactly right.

LUJAN: ...each other. And I'm hoping that we can get some certainty with the treatment of fixed versus mobile in that area. And lastly, I -- I'd like for the record if there's any way that you might be able to provide us more specifics and details with what's been talked about as commercially reasonable...

WHEELER: Good.

LUJAN: ...as well as we talk about now pretty smaller companies have disadvantages. I apologize again, Mr. Chairman. I could always sit and visit with you. And the last thing that I would say is President Obama isn't in support of an open internet and I would encourage you to speak with him. So thank you very much for that as well.

WHEELER: Let me just -- Congressman, so am I.

WALDEN: Thank you. Thank you very much. The Chair recognizes the gentleman from Louisiana, Mr. Scalise.

SCALISE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman for having the hearing and thank you Commissioner Wheeler for being here today and answering our questions. And there was -- as we look at the potential changes that have been proposed, a lot of us that want to continue to maintain a free and open internet want to make sure that we're going about it the right way. I know you've got some concerns with the fact that the FCC would even consider going to Title II route in terms of reclassifying broadband, you know.

And a lot of us had reached out for our constituents to -- to have them also give us suggestions on things that they would like to ask you as well. And a lot of the -- the comments that we got I know that I got in my district were just concerns about maintaining that open internet, and keeping the government out of regulating it, and -- and trying to make sure that the government doesn't impede the ability for the innovations that we've seen which have been so dramatic and revolutionized to not only the country, but revolutionized the entire world. And it's a lot of innovation that -- that's made in America. And we want to continue to see that innovation thrive.

When you -- when you look at going into the reclassification, and there's a proposal that's out there. I know, like I said, I've got concerns about that. But in your written statement, you assert that the private sector must play the leading role in extending broadband networks to every American. That if it were to be reclassified under Title II, who -- who would pay for extending those networks if they're subject to common carrier regulations.

WHEELER: Private sector.

SCALISE: But then when you look at the -- the Title II route, would the FCC have the authority to regulate broadband pricing?

WHEELER: So in the vastness of Title II, that is conceivable. One of the reasons that we are asking for Title II versus Section 706 comments in this proceeding is to be able to specifically zero-in on what are issues such as that. What are the...

SCALISE: So you think you may have the ability to regulate broadband pricing, is that something you -- you think could be an open...

WHEELER: Now, let's...

SCALISE: ...possibility for the FCC?

WHEELER: Should a full Title II regime be chosen, which should has not been, we are proposing...

SCALISE: But you're making the proposals.

WHEELER: ...Section 706.

SCALISE: Right.

WHEELER: No, we're -- we're -- no we're not. What we're doing is we're proposing Section 706 as the approach and then we've asked questions about Title II. And these are the kinds of issues that come up -- will come up in that discussion and that are gonna warrant...

SCALISE: But if -- if you'd in them telecommunication services. You know, because that puts broadband into a different realm than it is today. It's not there right now. If you do choose to try to put it there. Which state public utility in the -- in our State. We've got a public service commission. Would those state public service commissions and other related entities in the States be able to -- to regulate broadband at that point?

WHEELER: So what we have proposed is not Title II, it's Section 706. What we have asked is for a discussion of Title II and those kinds of issues. But our proposal for which I've taken a lot of heat is not Title II. I've said...

SCALISE: We don't have to go forward with the proposal.

WHEELER: I've said -- I've said...

SCALISE: So you stop taking the heat right now and...

WHEELER: No, I've said -- I've said that we're -- I said that Title II was on the table. That we're willing to look at Title II. But -- and -- and Mr. Waxman has a specific proposal where he thinks that Title II ought to be a backup and that's a proposal that is important and worth considering. But the proposal that we made is Section 706.

SCALISE: Let me ask you this because you're also -- it seems like a one-way street where you're just targeting this towards internet service providers. I mean there are a lot of content carriers out there too, content providers that, you know, a lot of members have used the Netflix example or, you know, Google and other content providers that also have a play in this realm that that you just seem to be targeting this towards internet service providers.

And so I'm not sure if there's some -- some acts to grind there, but it just seems like it's a -- it's a one-sided approach that you're taking even in the review. And I -- I wouldn't -- wouldn't recommend going down that road for any of these folks. But I just wanted to point that out.

And one last thing coz I know I'm running out of time. In the February report, the FCC, some of your staff in the working group, recommended eliminating some of the reports that are out there, the Orbit report, the International Broadband report, and Modifying Video Competition report and Cable Price and Service, some of those things.

I've got a piece of legislation we've passed out of the Full House twice now, very bipartisan figures unanimous earlier in this Congress called the FCC Consolidated Reporting Act, which really tries to -- to take a -- a broad view and into eliminate a lot of the outdated reports, the streamline reporting process, something that I think you've seen bipartisan's report to do in the House.

We're trying to get the Senate to take that up. I'm not sure if you've got a comment on what you think should happen there, if that's something you're supportive of generally, especially as it relates to -- to the Bipartisan Bill in the House trying to move through the Senate to also would become law to streamline the process as your staff is suggesting some of these areas.

WHEELER: So -- so, you know, in the Senate side, it's Senator Heller who has been...

SCALISE: Yeah.

WHEELER: ...pushing on this. And I know that he and Senator Rockefeller are talking about it in terms of their package of legislation over there. I definitely agree that -- that there are -- there is a plethora of reports and that we are spending a lot of time that could be better organized, shall we say.

SCALISE: Including competitiveness in the telegraph industry which is still on the books, which we're trying to get rid off in this bill over there. I appreciate that and anything you can do to help us advocate for the advancement. I do think that's one area where we found a lot of bipartisans support in the way it passed the House. Hopefully we can get the Heller bill move through the Senate as well on the -- and get that to the present statute.

WHEELER: Thank you, gentleman.

SCALISE: Thank you very much for your time. And I yield back as well my time.

WALDEN: Thank you very much, Mr. Scalise. I do not see any member in the Democratic side. Mr. Kinzinger of Illinois is recognized.

KINZINGER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. And thank you for being here today with us. I know it's a lot of...

WHEELER: Thank you for your patience, Mr. Kinzinger.

KINZINGER: Yeah, you're welcome. I might be the end. Wow. So -- but we had a lot of big issues we want to talk about. I'm just going to hit a couple right now. I'd like to talk to you a little -- I know it was -- it was touched earlier about the E-Rate Program.

I'm a big supporter of the intentions of this program and especially it's modernization. And I appreciate the Commission putting on the recent workshop on this issue. I have a few concerns I want to address.

I represent a rural district with a number of very small schools and libraries. And over the past few months, I've reached out to a lot of these entities and asked them what their concern is and -- and asked them about their participation or their lack of participation in the program to see what concern -- concerns or issues they have with the program itself.

The number one problem raised in these conversations was the complexity involved in both applying for and eventually receiving the funding necessary to move forward in implementing new technology in their facilities through the E-Rate Program.

In hearing this, I actually looked into the issue a little further and found out that the basic application for funding, and this is the process of it, but the basic application is 17 pages long. And with additional technologies not being necessary can run even longer, i.e. Wi-Fi. I would actually probably rather punch myself in the face and be the guy that has to fill this out.

So the complexity of the -- of the application process has actually caused a number of these schools to spend money on outside consultants to help guide them through this process. And this is money that's no longer being spend on our students and automatically puts many smaller rural schools at a disadvantage coz they don't have the funds necessary to pay this out so I can sell them. Essentially, we leave individuals in a technological desert if you will.

As the Commissioner continues these efforts to modernize the E- Rate Program, what are your plans to simplify the application process for these small and rural districts. And also, will you commit to working to address the issues faced by these schools who have routinely told me they simply cannot afford to pursue these funds.

WHEELER: Congressman, I share your shock and dismay. We're gonna fix it.

KINZINGER: Good. All right. Do you have an idea of a timeframe? How long?

WHEELER: Yeah, we're gonna...

KINZINGER: We're busy. We're going home.

WHEELER: It's gonna be part of our -- of our E-Rate modernization program that we'll be bringing forward. There's actually a series of things that we're gonna begin administratively even before that -- that rulemaking takes place. It is -- yes, sir. I mean I...

KINZINGER: All right.

WHEELER: I'm as -- you know, how do we get online. So it becomes an interesting challenge. So here we are talking about broadband access for schools and libraries and we have a 17-page paper process.

KINZINGER: Right.

WHEELER: So unfortunately, it's not something that you can solve just like this because as I've indicated like to Mr. Welch, we have awful IT systems. But what I would like to get to is for your schools and all schools and libraries to be able to get online to make their filling, to be able to track that filling and where things stand, and to do it less frequently than annually.

KINZINGER: Right.

WHEELER: Well, I appreciate that. I want to touch on one other quick issue in this short amount of time. Again, thank you for your consideration with the -- the E-Rate issue.

I'm concerned with the process and policy rationale used to changed the FCC's treatment of broadcast JSAs for the purpose of the broadcast ownership rules. The decision to count TV JSAs' ownership has the effect of tightening ownership restrictions without the comprehensive review of the ownership rules that is required by statute. And your analysis seem to lack an appreciation for the public interest benefited -- benefits fostered by JSAs.

In Rockford, for instance, an area I represent, without these agreements, the Fox station produces actually a Hispanic newscast and they've said that they will not be able to produce that Hispanic newscast, for instance. Well, I don't believe my local TV station should have to fight for a waiver and we can have a broader issue on the whole discussion in general.

I do wanna say in light of your rule, are you gonna make sure that these stations can take advantage of waivers and will there be clear transparent standards for applying for waivers in this process.

WHEELER: Thank you, Congressman because you've raised a really important point about waivers.

The reality was why we had to deal with JSAs is there was becoming a cottage industry in this town, down on K Street of lawyers figuring out creative ways to get around the ownership rules of the Commission's head in place forever. And JSAs were a favorite way of doing that.

What we have said is that you have to have attributable ownership as you've indicated. But that there is a waiver process to address exactly what you're talking about in Rockford. And yes it's an expedited process, and it is a -- it's a -- it's a situation unfortunately where -- where the process took over and perverted the underlying rules and the basic concepts of ownership.

KINZINGER: We can -- and -- and we can have that broader discussion when I have more time. My time is expired but I will say I've heard a lot of concerns from local TV stations even on my district. And I hope that, you know, while we disagree with the rule, I hope that you make it very clear how they can apply for these waivers and how they can get this thing carry them. Mr. Chairman, I yield back and thank you.

WHEELER: Yes, thank you.

WALDEN: Thank you very much. In behalf of Mr. Matheson and of myself, thank you Chairman Wheeler for your testimony this morning. We look forward to working with you in the future. And the hearing is now adjourned.

Lujan Highlights USDA Funding Aimed at Fighting Poverty in Rural New Mexico

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 242 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N.M. (3rd CD), issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third District highlighted funding from the U.S. Department of Agriculture (USDA) today through the StrikeForce initiative that provides assistance to farmers, ranchers, and private forest owners in rural areas. The USDA is providing $15 million in 20 states, including $450,000 for New Mexico, which targets rural communities that experience "persistent poverty."

"Sadly, too many people in New Mexico are living in poverty and struggling to get by. With the economy continuing to feel the effects of the deep recession, rural communities have been hard hit," Congressman Lujan said. "This program can help rural farmers and ranchers by providing critical funding for conservation efforts that enable them to improve their land that is so important to their economic wellbeing."

Through the Natural Resources Conservation Service, the USDA will provide technical and financial assistance in the StrikeForce areas, building on efforts that have invested a total of $653 million for conservation efforts since 2010. Funds, which are provided through the USDA Environmental Quality Incentives Program, can be used for conservation activities, including water conservation improvements and soil protections. Applications for funding are accepted at local USDA Service Centers.

Journal selections for U.S. Senate and House

SECTION: EDITORIALS; Pg. A6

LENGTH: 827 words

Today the Journal continues its endorsements in contested races in the June 3 primary election.

U.S. Senate - Allen Weh

Republican Allen Weh has earned bachelor's and master's degrees; did three tours of duty in Vietnam; was shot three times and awarded three Purple Hearts; created a $160-million-a-year aviation business on a $25,000 loan; served in the Gulf War, Somalia and Pacific Command; and ran a competitive campaign in a crowded field for governor in 2009.

Summed up, he gets things done and does not suffer fools lightly. The U.S. Senate could use both his patriotism and pragmatism to move the country forward.

Weh says he's "suiting back up" and making another run at public office because of Benghazi, specifically that the country needs wisdom and experience to set an actual foreign policy, to build a strong economy that in turn strengthens national defense, to draw appropriate red lines and then hold strong.

He says he would be only the second combat veteran in the current Senate, and "because I've been shot, I'm twiceascautious"about sending American military personnel into harm's way. A retired colonel, he remains committed to safeguarding bases and military missions and committed to ensuring veterans are given their due when they return home.

Weh supports a budget approach similar to the Simpson-Bowles recommendations that would have reduced the deficit by $2.5 trillion over a decade; immigration reform that secures the border, provides for guest workers and sets a fair path to citizenship; a balanced approach to federal regulation; investment in the nation's infrastructure; and a collective effort to reform the Affordable Care Act rather than a repeal that reinstates a broken system.

His formative years gave Weh "zero tolerance for poor leadership and incompetence." Washington could use more of that. The Journal recommends Republican voters select Weh to represent them on the November ballot against Democratic Sen. Tom Udall.

U.S. House District 1 - Richard Priem

Republican Richard Priem started out his professional career as a reporter and disc jockey. His ability to communicate has seen him through bachelor's and master's degrees as well as doctoral coursework, and enabled him to teach leadership at the West Point Military Academy, improve the chain of command during Desert Storm, help the State Department train foreign officials, develop training for first responders and successfully sue a former employer for $12 million that was returned to American taxpayers.

A 21-year Army veteran, Priem says he knows bureaucratic inefficiency when he sees it and hopes to refocus attention on what matters. "I'm outcomes, not process, focused," he explains.

Priem also has a strong opinion on serving the nation's military veterans and wants the entire VA chain of command called on the carpet for the recent hospital scandal.

He supports a replacement to the Affordable Care Act that emphasizes a private-sector solution that takes care of people, would fight unconstitutional surveillance by government agencies, would downsize government and champion a secure electronic system of remote voting for House members so they could spend more time in their districts.

Immigration reform must be compassionate and understanding, Priem says, with border security and a guest worker as program important steps.

The Journal recommends Republican voters in District 1 select Priem to take on Democratic Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham in November.

U.S. House District 3 - Ben Ray Lujan

Incumbent Ben Ray Lujan has shown he is a good fit for his northern New Mexico congressional district and a good addition to the U.S. House of Representatives. Lujan, a Democrat who took office in 2009, has moved beyond being a new kid on the block.

Before winning election to Congress, Lujan served on the New Mexico Public Regulation Commission, was a deputy state treasurer and an administrator in the New Mexico Department of Cultural Affairs.

In Congress, Lujan is a champion for New Mexico families, consumers and small businesses. He voted for the Affordable Care Act, cosponsored the Credit Cardholders Bill of Rights which increases protections against unfair and misleading credit card practices and included an amendment to legislation to reform Wall Street and voted for increased charter school funding.

Lujan supports renewable energy, training for clean energy jobs, more scientific research by New Mexico's labs and protecting New Mexico's natural resources. He introduced legislation to protect the Sabinoso Wilderness and for the Rio Grande del Norte National Monument.

He also cosponsored the Veterans Health Care Budget Reform and Transparency Act to help improve health care services to veterans.

Lujan has shown that he takes the needs of his constituents seriously and follows through with action.

The Journal endorses Ben Ray Lujan for the Democratic nomination in Congressional District 3 to take on Republican Jefferson L. Byrd on Nov. 4.

Democrat seeking to unseat U.S. Rep. Luján faces 'super uphill battle'

BYLINE: Patrick Malone, The Santa Fe New Mexican

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 964 words

May 18--The race for the Democratic nomination in New Mexico's 3rd Congressional District pits a handsomely funded incumbent with an established political name, Ben Ray Luján, against Robert Blanch, an upstart transplant running on a populist platform and a shoestring budget.

Luján, 41, is the son of the late New Mexico House Speaker Ben Luján of Nambé. He has represented the northern third of New Mexico in Congress since 2009. Before that, he served as an elected member of the New Mexico Public Regulation Commission, as chief financial officer at the state's Department of Cultural Affairs and as deputy state treasurer. Luján speaks the lexicon of Washington, D.C., politics fluently and has clear priorities regarding issues facing the state he represents and his positions on them.

Keeping Amtrak's Southwest Chief on its current route through Northern New Mexico, accelerating the path for research and development concepts hatched in New Mexico to reach the marketplace, preserving Internet neutrality, increasing firefighting resources, continuing the work he's done to foster science and math emphases in schools, promoting renewable energy and overturning freewheeling campaign spending practices allowed by U.S. Supreme Court rulings -- these are just a few of the objectives on Luján's platform.

Both candidates agree that priority No. 1 on the minds of voters is improving the economy and fostering job creation.

Blanch, 51, moved from Silicon Valley in California to Albuquerque about four years ago. He quit his $46,000-a-year job as a prosecutor with the Bernalillo County District Attorney's Office in February to campaign full-time, and he dipped into his personal retirement funds to finance his run for Congress.

Blanch's stance on particular issues is intentionally ambiguous. He said if elected, he would take a cue from the majority of his constituents.

"There will probably be issues that will come up that I haven't taken positions on," Blanch readily admits. "But I mainly want to reflect the voices of the people I represent. I'm focused on being a listening-centric type of congressman rather than a talker. Basically, what the majority wants is how I'll vote."

He said the preferences of constituents would be gleaned from town-hall meetings, where unaffiliated voters and Republicans would be as welcome to express themselves as Democrats.

"Should I raise taxes by 20 percent? Should I lower them by 20 percent?" Blanch said. "It really depends on what people want."

Blanch's wife works at Sandia National Laboratories, and although the lab wasn't affected as directly as some agencies by last fall's federal government shutdown, Blanch said the gridlock and resulting uncertainty inspired his run for Congress.

"It looks like in Washington, all they're doing is fighting and not getting anything done," he said.

Blanch came of age during President Jimmy Carter's administration, and his distaste for its policies led him to register as a Republican at age 18. He became a Democrat in 1990, realizing that his stances on social issues clashed with the GOP.

Before moving to New Mexico, he practiced law in California, Illinois and Massachusetts. He tackled cases involving international intellectual property disputes, among other things, and says his professional experience negotiating thorny conflicts would serve him well in Congress.

Blanch drew annual incomes as high as $225,000, according to his résumé on file with the Bernalillo County District Attorney's Office.

But in this congressional race, Luján's finances dwarf Blanch's. Blanch estimates his expenditures and contributions -- mostly his own money -- add up to less than $30,000. As of the end of March, Luján had raised nearly $700,000, and had about $590,000 left to spend, according to the Federal Election Commission.Luján's political action committee, Turquoise PAC, has pumped approximately $80,000 into targeted congressional races and New Mexico legislative races to help Democrats, and has another $13,000 on hand.

"Right from the start, it's been a super uphill battle," Blanch said. "[Luján] has a ton of money. I have limited resources, borrowing against my own 401(k) to make this work."

He said during his road trip on the campaign trail, Northern New Mexico residents have expressed that they feel forgotten by Luján.

"They don't think they're being represented," Blanch said.

Luján stands by his connection to his constituents and cited about 270 public outreach events during his time in office.

"I'm proud of the fact that I travel a lot of New Mexico's roads," Luján said. "I'm proud of the fact that I'm from New Mexico, grew up on a small farm, working the acequias."

Luján confessed that he knows little about his opponent. He said who he is running against is secondary to his firsthand knowledge and commitment to solving the problems that matter most to New Mexico.

During the current congressional cycle, Luján has carried 16 bills. The average throughout the U.S. House of Representatives is 10.

"That comes directly from working with the community and trying to represent all sides of an argument, but also representing what's important to New Mexico," Luján said. "It's taking those ideas. It's trying to make a difference."

The winner of the Democratic primary will face the sole Republican in the race, Jefferson Lee Byrd, a Tucumcari rancher who lost in the general election to Luján two years ago. Byrd's campaign as of the end of March had raised about $5,500, according to the Federal Election Commission.

Congressional Votes for New Mexico the Week of 05/09 - 05/15/2014

BYLINE: by TARGETED NEWS SERVICE, Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 2439 words

DATELINE: WASHINGTON

WASHINGTON, May 18 -- There were seven key House votes in the week ending Thursday; there were 10 key Senate votes. There were eight House roll call votes in the week, and 18 roll call votes in the Senate. The most important House vote was to pass a bill to make the tax credit for a company's research expenses permanent. The most important Senate vote was to reject the end of debate on a bill to extend a package of tax credits that expired at the end of 2013.

In addition to roll call votes, the Senate also passed a resolution (S. Res. 402), sponsored by Sen. Al Franken, D-Minn., to express the Senate's regret for having passed section 3 of the Expatriation Act of 1907, which revoked citizenship for women who married foreign nationals.

Here's a look at how area members of Congress voted over the previous week.

HOUSE VOTES:

House Vote 1:

MAKING RESEARCH TAX CREDIT PERMANENT: The House has passed the American Research and Competitiveness Act (H.R. 4438), sponsored by Rep. Kevin Brady, R-Texas. The bill would make permanent the tax credit for a company's research expenses. Brady said making the research tax credit a permanent part of the tax code would give companies certainty and thereby encourage "energy innovation and manufacturing innovation that will create good-paying jobs and good-paying wages for Americans." A bill opponent, Rep. Steny H. Hoyer, D-Md., called the bill "very bad policy" because it was not paid for by an offsetting tax increase or spending cut, and therefore would add billions of dollars to the debt. The vote, on May 9, was 274 yeas to 131 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

NAYS: Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

House Vote 2:

CONFLICTS OF INTEREST AT CHARTER SCHOOLS: The House has rejected an amendment sponsored by Rep. Kathy Castor, D-Fla., to the Success and Opportunity through Quality Charter Schools Act (H.R. 10). The amendment would have required the Education Secretary to develop and enforce guidelines to prevent conflicts of interest at charter schools that receive federal funding. Castor cited numerous examples of conflict of interest at the schools in which officials have enriched themselves at the expense of taxpayers, and said "it is clear that we need more accountability and better procedures in place to protect taxpayer investment" in the schools. An amendment opponent, Rep. John Kline, R-Minn., said the amendment was unnecessary because the bill already covered the issue, and conflicts of interest were best addressed at the state and local level, not by involving the Education Department in local charter schools. The vote, on May 9, was 190 yeas to 205 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

NAYS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 3:

INFORMATION DISCLOSURE BY CHARTER SCHOOLS: The House has rejected an amendment sponsored by Rep. Sheila Jackson Lee, D-Texas, to the Success and Opportunity through Quality Charter Schools Act (H.R. 10). The amendment would have required that states ensure charter schools publish on their websites information about their policies for student recruitment, orientation materials, enrollment criteria, student discipline policies, behavior codes, and parent contract requirements, including fees parents pay to the schools. Jackson Lee said the disclosure requirement would give parents vital information to help decide whether to enroll their children at a given school. An amendment opponent, Rep. John Kline, R-Minn., said it would unfairly put "additional reporting requirements on the charter schools that are not required of traditional public schools." The vote, on May 9, was 179 yeas to 220 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd)

NAYS: Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 4:

DISCLOSURE RULES FOR CHARTER SCHOOLS: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Frederica S. Wilson, D-Fla., to the Success and Opportunity through Quality Charter Schools Act (H.R. 10). The amendment would require states to ensure that charter schools provide the same information to the public that public schools must provide. Wilson said: "When public charters are held to the same standards of accountability, equitable access, and transparency, as in traditional public schools, all of our students receive a better education, but when public charters are not held to these standards, a student's learning suffers, and taxpayers' money is wasted." The vote, on May 9, was 373 yeas to 32 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 5:

CAREER COUNSELING AT SCHOOLS: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. James R. Langevin, D-R.I., to the Success and Opportunity through Quality Charter Schools Act (H.R. 10). The amendment would include comprehensive career counseling practices among the factors for the Education Department to consider when prioritizing grants to local educational agencies. Langevin said the provision would help "give school counselors the most up-to-date information and training that they need as they are advising their young students about their career path forward." The vote, on May 9, was 378 yeas to 27 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 6:

BEST PRACTICES AND CHARTER SCHOOLS: The House has passed an amendment sponsored by Rep. Suzanne Bonamici, D-Ore., to the Success and Opportunity through Quality Charter Schools Act (H.R. 10). The amendment would request states to report to the Education Department on whether best practices adopted at charter schools have been shared with the public school system. Bonamici said given that charter schools receive government funding, it was reasonable to ask the schools to provide information about best practices to benefit students in public schools. The vote, on May 9, was 363 yeas to 41 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

House Vote 7:

GRANTS FOR CHARTER SCHOOLS: The House has passed the Success and Opportunity through Quality Charter Schools Act (H.R. 10), sponsored by Rep. John Kline, R-Minn. The bill would establish a revised five-year program of charter school grants to states and have the Education Department research the effectiveness of the grant program. Kline called the bill "a commonsense proposal that will improve educational opportunities for students across the board and provide families with additional school choice options." A bill opponent, Rep. Kathy Castor, D-Fla., said it lacked safeguards against wasteful and fraudulent spending by charter school operators. The vote, on May 9, was 360 yeas to 45 nays.

YEAS: Rep. Michelle Lujan Grisham D-NM (1st), Rep. Ben Ray Lujan D-NM (3rd), Rep. Stevan Pearce R-NM (2nd)

SENATE VOTES:

Senate Vote 1:

APPEALS COURT JUDGE: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Robin S. Rosenbaum to serve as a judge on the U.S. Eleventh Circuit Court of Appeals. A supporter, Sen. Bill Nelson, D-Fla., cited Rosenbaum's unanimously well qualified rating from the American Bar Association, her two years of experience as a federal district judge for the Southern District of Florida, and the pressing need to fill vacancies on the Eleventh Circuit Court to handle the court's heavy caseload. The vote, on May 12, was unanimous with 91 yeas.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 2:

DEBATE ON ENERGY EFFICIENCY BILL: The Senate has rejected a cloture motion to end debate on the Energy Savings and Industrial Competitiveness Act (S. 2262), sponsored by Sen. Jeanne Shaheen, D-N.H. The bill would establish stricter national model energy efficiency standards for residential and commercial buildings, direct the Energy Department to work with industry on the development of efficiency technologies, and establish an initiative for financing efficiency upgrades at commercial buildings. A supporter of ending debate, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid, said the bill "will make our country more energy independent and protect our environment. It will also save consumers and taxpayers money, and lots of it." An opponent of ending debate, Senate Minority Leader Mitch McConnell, said Republican senators were entitled to offer their relevant amendments to the bill for vote by the Senate, but Democrats were blocking them from doing so. The vote, on May 12, was 55 yeas to 36 nays, with a three-fifths majority required to end debate.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 3:

EXTENDING TAX CREDITS: The Senate has passed a motion to close debate on the motion to proceed to consideration of the Hire More Heroes Act (H.R. 3474), sponsored by Rep. Kevin Brady, R-Texas. The bill would extend for two years more than $85 billion of tax credits that expired at the close of 2013, including the wind production tax credit for wind power farms and the research and development tax credit for companies. A supporter, Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., said the tax credit extensions would help the economy and provide tax policy certainty for businesses and families while Congress works on longer-term efforts to reform the tax code. An opponent of closing debate, Sen. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., cited the wind tax credit as one example of "wasteful extenders which are really just subsidies" benefiting a certain industry but not the broader economy. The vote to end debate on the motion to proceed, on May 13, was 96 yeas to 3 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 4:

ARIZONA DISTRICT JUDGE: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Steven Paul Logan to serve as a U.S. District Judge for the District of Arizona. A supporter, Sen. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., noted Logan's distinguished military record, including receiving a Bronze Star, and the experience he has gained in dealing with immigration issues as an assistant U.S. attorney in Minnesota and in Arizona. Flake added that Logan's confirmation would help ease a crippling shortage of judges serving in the Arizona district court. The vote, on May 14, was unanimous with 96 yeas.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 5:

SECOND ARIZONA DISTRICT JUDGE: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of John Joseph Tuchi to serve as a U.S. District Judge for the District of Arizona. A supporter, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., cited Tuchi's more than 15 years of experience as a prosecutor in the Arizona U.S. attorney's office and previous experience as a clerk in the Ninth Circuit Court of Appeals. McCain said Tuchi "has the qualifications to be a district judge based in part on his dedication to public service, extensive trial experience, and practice before federal courts." The vote, on May 14, was unanimous with 96 yeas.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 6:

THIRD ARIZONA DISTRICT JUDGE: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Diane J. Humetewa to serve as a U.S. District Judge for the District of Arizona. A supporter, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., noted that upon confirmation, Humetewa would be the first Native-American woman to serve as a federal judge. McCain said Humetewa "has an impressive legal background ranging from work as a prosecutor and appellate court judge to the Hopi nation. She served the U.S. attorney for the District of Arizona. And hers is a historic nomination." The vote, on May 14, was unanimous with 96 yeas.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 7:

FOURTH ARIZONA DISTRICT JUDGE: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Rosemary Marquez to serve as a U.S. District Judge for the District of Arizona. A supporter, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., said Marquez "has worked as a public defender and prosecutor as well as in private practice. Her extensive experience working in border districts and her Hispanic heritage will be invaluable assets to the federal court." The vote, on May 15, was 81 yeas to 15 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 8:

FIFTH ARIZONA DISTRICT JUDGE: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of Douglas L. Rayes to serve as a U.S. District Judge for the District of Arizona. A supporter, Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., cited Rayes' 18 years of experience as a private practice lawyer and current status as a judge in the superior court of Maricopa County, in which position he has presided over thousands of cases in family law, criminal law, and complex litigation. McCain said Rayes' "experience and insight will be valuable to the federal court." The vote, on May 15, was 77 yeas to 19 nays.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 9:

SIXTH ARIZONA DISTRICT JUDGE: The Senate has confirmed the nomination of James Alan Soto to serve as a U.S. District Judge for the District of Arizona. A supporter, Sen. Jeff Flake, R-Ariz., cited Soto's 13 years of experience as a judge in the superior court of Santa Cruz County, currently as a presiding judge of the court. Flake said Soto "will be a great district court judge." The vote, on May 15, was 93 yeas to 1 nay.

YEAS: Sen. Martin Heinrich D-NM, Sen. Tom Udall D-NM

Senate Vote 10:

DEBATE ON TAX CREDITS BILL: The Senate has rejected a motion to end debate on an amendment sponsored by Sen. Ron Wyden, D-Ore., to the Hire More Heroes Act (H.R. 3474). The bill would extend for two years more than $85 billion of tax credits that expired at the close of 2013, including the wind production tax credit for wind power farms and the research and development tax credit for companies. Wyden said failing to end debate on the tax credits would result in allowing many large tax increases to remain in effect that "would punish innovators, punish our small businesses, punish homeowners who are underwater with their mortgages, punish returning veterans looking for jobs, and punish students and classroom teachers." An opponent of ending debate, Sen. Dan Coats, R-Ind., criticized Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid for refusing to allow Republican senators to offer amendments to the bill, and asked that his party have the opportunity to add its input as part of the process of deliberation before a final vote. The vote, on May 15, was 53 yeas to 40 nays, with a three-fifths majority required to end debate.

Tohatchi student wins Congressional Art Competition

GALLUP - Tohatchi High School Senior Davin Nez was awarded this year's Congressional Art Competition winner Saturday, May 4. The announcement was made by Rep. Ben Ray Lujan, D-N. M., during a reception at the City of Santa Fe Arts Commission Community Gallery.

Nez's drawing, entitled "Tribute to the Elders: Navajo Woman," will be displayed as part of an exhibit in the U.S. Capitol for one year. His artwork was among 56 other entries from high schools throughout the entire district. Pieces that placed second through sixth were also recognized and will be displayed in Luján's district offices across Northern New Mexico.

"Just as in year's past, the submissions for the 2014 Congressional Art Competition showcased the tremendous talent of New Mexico's young artists." Lujan said in a news release May 5. "These students have shown great potential and are continuing a proud tradition of artistic excellence that is a hallmark of New Mexico."

Nez received the first place award alongside his mother, father, two sisters and art teacher, Sharon Swindler. According to Nez's mother, Angela Nez, his family was unaware that he had even entered the competition and they attribute his achievement to his art teacher.

"We are all very excited for Davin, it was a great surprise for our family," she said.

Swindler, who has been Nez's art teacher since the sixth grade, personally asked him if he wished to compete after she received three invitations from Congressman Lujan. She stated it was her faith in his exceptional artistic abilities that made her believe he was the perfect nominee.

"He definitely deserved the award, he has always been excellent," she said. "Davin is the first student out of the many years that I have taught to just have a natural ability to draw."

Nez stated he was very grateful his teacher presented him with the opportunity to be a part of the competition. Having mentored him for well over six years of his life, Swindler has been much more to Nez than just a teacher.

"My teacher has taught me everything I know about art," he said. "I'm really glad she got me to enter my drawing, it was worth it."

Nez drew inspiration for the winning art piece from a photograph of his grandmother. He stated that he started the drawing by sketching her eyes and over the progression of four weeks he had completed an entire portrait. Special attention was made to the foreground and background of the drawing that wasn't in conjunction with the original image.

"I wanted to draw her as I always saw her, how I remembered her," he said. "She was always at the table, with a cup of coffee, in mid conversation-I wanted to capture that moment."

Nez is eagerly anticipating his trip to Washington next month, meanwhile he is preparing for graduation next week and his upcoming endeavors. He hopes to continue pursuing an art career by attending the Institute of American Indian Arts in the fall.

Dear Senate, charters drive U.S. school reform

SECTION: EDITORIALS; Pg. A5

LENGTH: 441 words

The U.S. House of Representatives, including all of New Mexico's delegation, has voted to expand a proven education reform that is delivering results in the Land of Enchantment.

That reform is charter schools and the U.S. Senate should follow suit rather than depend on a yet-to-be-proposed revamp of the shelved No Child Left Behind Act to supply one-size-fits-all reform.

H.R. 10 authorizes $300 million annually from 2015 through 2020, consolidates two existing federal programs and encourages the replication of existing high-quality charters. Nearly 20,000 New Mexico students - around 6 percent of public school students in the state - attend 94 charter schools. Two of those, the Albuquerque Institute for Math and Science and Moreno Valley High in Angel Fire, routinely make the national lists of the best schools in the nation.

It is important to note that the charter school movement has had problems and bad actors - schools that use tax dollars to pay multiple salaries to individuals and/or don't deliver on their mission. But New Mexico Democratic Reps. Michelle Lujan Grisham and Ben Ray Luján recognize the importance of improving the state's perennially near-bottom rankings and say they will work to ensure any federal charter school law has mechanisms for "transparency and accountability."

That's all any parent, taxpayer, business leader, government official and great teacher should want - a system that wisely uses the finite amount of education spending available to best serve students by preparing them for infinite possibilities in postsecondary education and/or the workplace.

Unfortunately, Sen. Tom Udall, D-N.M., prefers that the Senate "thoughtfully consider and update No Child Left Behind to improve all schools, rather than focusing solely on charter schools in piecemeal legislation," his spokeswoman says.

But 42 states currently have waivers from NCLB, a well-intentioned but ultimately flawed system of accountability that rightly brought education to the public forefront but set all schools up for failure as it focused on proficiency rather than improvement.

Quality charters are clearly focused on the latter and, in New Mexico, 13, including AIMS and Moreno Valley, have received waivers from the state-mandated teacher evaluations because they have fine-tuned how they measure their students' improvement.

It's that kind of student-centered inspiration, innovation and replication that drives successful education reform, and New Mexico is fortunate to have real leaders in its schools and its government who are making it happen.

Leaders in the U.S. Senate should take a lesson from the House and help expand it.

New Mexico Dems: Congressman Ben Ray Lujan: Republican Research and Development Does Not Fund and Actually Refuses to Actually Support Research and Development

BYLINE: Targeted News Service

LENGTH: 477 words

DATELINE: SANTA FE, N.M.

The New Mexico Democratic Party issued the following news release:

Congressman Ben Ray Lujan of New Mexico's Third Congressional District, a strong supporter of research and development (R&D), today voted against a House Republican bill (HR 4438) that refused to fund R&D. With their bill, House Republicans opted to move forward with a political ploy that jeopardizes the continuation of a number of tax cuts that American families depend upon--including the deduction of out-of-pocket classroom expenses for teachers, the Indian Employment Tax Credit, mortgage debt relief for homeowners, deductions for mass transit benefits, and renewable energy tax credits. Traditionally, these tax credits are passed together as part of an annual extender package that is compliant with House PAYGO rules, a rule Lujan supports. By passing this legislation separately and without a budgetary offset, Republicans are neglecting to continue other important tax cuts while increasing the deficit. Furthermore, Republicans are refusing to pass a needed extension of emergency unemployment benefits without an offset--while passing today's legislation which is fifteen times more expensive to the national debt.

Lujan, has long supported the Research and Development tax credit, which drives innovative new industries for New Mexico. As a cochair of the Technology Transfer Caucus--which promotes moving technological innovations to the marketplace--he has been a strong advocate for R&D. Additionally he authored a bill on Cooperative Research and Development Agreements (CRADAs) to help foster relationships between businesses and national laboratories, which are often involved in R&D-related work. Lujan also supported a budget that makes the R&D tax credit permanent, closing tax loopholes to offset the costs.

"As an advocate for the R&D tax credit and a supporter of a permanent extension of R&D, I cosponsored the original version of this bill," Rep. Lujan said. "However, the bill that was brought to the House floor today is the first of 6 House Republican piecemeal bills that they refuse to pay for-selling R&D short, adding $156 billion to the deficit over the next 10 years, and putting other critical programs at risk.

"This unfunded political ploy has far reaching and disastrous implications because it could risk funding for Medicare, social security, and education-and it also does not include extensions of the tax credits that families depend on.

"It is time for us to come together to support real Research and Development that provides for economic growth and job creation. I believe that New Mexicans deserve a more responsible and effective approach that supports innovation without balancing the books on our middle class families, seniors, teachers, and students."

Congressmen: Downtown post office will stay put

BYLINE: Steve Terrell, The Santa Fe New Mexican

SECTION: STATE AND REGIONAL NEWS

LENGTH: 684 words

May 10--Despite earlier plans to move the city's main post office from its downtown location, the U.S. Postal Service has decided the office on Federal Place will stay where it is, members of New Mexico's congressional delegation announced Friday.

Sens. Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Rep. Ben Ray Luján said they welcome the news that the idea to move the post office -- 120 S. Federal Place, across the street from City Hall -- has been shelved.

The Postal Service, which has been leasing the downtown Santa Fe space in a federal building managed by the General Services Administration, began raising concerns last year that its rental costs were too high, particularly as the agency was wrangling with a multibillion-dollar deficit. But its plans to move met with opposition from local residents and businesses.

"Moving the post office would be devastating for downtown Santa Fe. While it is critical to ensure the taxpayers are getting the best value for their dollar, the Postal Service never made a valid case to the federal delegation or the city of Santa Fe for why it needed to move out of its current building," Udall said in the news release. "This is very good news for downtown Santa Fe and the Postal Service workers who raised legitimate concerns about whether the proposed alternatives would have been appropriate."

Udall chairs the Appropriations Subcommittee that oversees both the GSA and Postal Service budgets.

Heinrich and Luján also said they were happy with the decision to keep the post office in its current location.

"Post offices are critical as they provide essential services to residents and small businesses in Santa Fe and across New Mexico, and they help preserve the unique fabric of our communities," Heinrich said.

"The Post Office is an important establishment in downtown Santa Fe and moving the location would have been detrimental to the community," Luján said.

As recently as last September, the Postal Service was proceeding with its plan to move. A spokesman told The New Mexican that the agency was negotiating with a potential new landlord in Santa Fe. "We don't have a specific date for the move," spokesman Peter Haas said. "We anticipate the retail portion of that operation might move in 2014."

Haas and other spokesmen couldn't be reached for comment Friday.

In July 2013, the Postal Service first announced the plan to move, saying it needed to cut costs. In a letter to city officials last year, the Postal Service said it preferred to move to Sanbusco Market Center, 100 N. Guadalupe St.

But Udall and then-Santa Fe Mayor David Coss said they would do their best to convince the Postal Service to drop the relocation plan. City officials filed a formal appeal to stop the move, but the appeal was denied.

Udall last August said the post office building likely would remain empty for a long time if the Postal Service moved out. "The GSA won't find anybody to fill that," he said. "I think it's going to be a big eyesore. You get an empty building like that, and you don't know what'll happen. People start painting graffiti on it, windows get broken. It's not a good situation."

According to a rental agreement obtained by The New Mexican last year, the Postal Service pays GSA an annual rent fee of $855,000, which includes 58 parking spots and a radio antenna. However, Haas in September said the Postal Service had not yet signed the rental agreement. It wasn't clear Friday whether that agreement has since been signed or whether the GSA agreed to lower the rent.

The building is occupied by not only the post office, but the city of Santa Fe, as well as several federal agencies. Besides selling stamps and hosting post office boxes, the Federal Place location is home to a postal distribution center, through which local mail flows to and from the processing center in Albuquerque.

WASHINGTON, D.C. - Today, U.S. Senators Tom Udall and Martin Heinrich and U.S. Representative Ben Ray Lujan welcomed news that the U.S. Postal Service has agreed to shelve a proposal to move out of downtown Santa Fe and instead keep the post office at its current site on Federal Place.

Udall, Heinrich and Lujan have been instrumental in working to keep the downtown post office open after questions were raised of the Postal Service and the General Services Agency (GSA) about whether a move out of the building would save money and meet the needs of the community. House members boost charter schools; NM reps. back funding new schools; prospects in Senate appear rocky

BYLINE: Michael Coleman Journal Washington Bureau

SECTION: METRO & NEW MEXICO; Pg. C1

LENGTH: 530 words

WASHINGTON - New Mexico's U.S. House members plan to vote for a rare, bipartisan education bill on the House floor today that would help create new charter schools across the country.

The bill would authorize $300million per year from 2015 through 2020 and consolidate two existing federal programs. It would also encourage replication of existing high-quality charter schools and help pay for new buildings. Charter schools, which often boast higher student achievement than regular public schools, typically use taxpayer dollars but are run by outside organizations. Critics contend they siphon money from low-performing schools that need it most.

Reps. Michelle Lujan Grisham and Ben Ray Luján, both New Mexico Democrats, told the Journal this week that they will work to ensure any federal charter school law contains mechanisms for "transparency and accountability." Rep. Steve Pearce, R-N.M., supports the bill.

Nearly 20,000 students in New Mexico - or roughly 6 percent of all public school students in the state - attend 94 charter schools. Twelve percent of Albuquerque Public Schools students are enrolled in charter schools, according to the National Alliance for Public Charter Schools.

"New Mexico has seen some positive results with charter schools, and I am hopeful that we can replicate that success and spur innovation throughout our public education system," Lujan Grisham said. "At the same time, we must ensure that federal dollars are spent wisely and that charter schools are held to the same standards as other public schools."

Luján said the bill contains a proposal he offered in the last Congress that calls for charter schools to establish plans for teacher training and mentoring in science, technology, engineering and math.

"Our nation's competitiveness depends upon our ability to educate our students, and while charter schools can offer innovative educational programs, it is important that they are held to the same accountability and transparency standards as traditional public schools," Luján said.

"Charter schools provide opportunities and school choices for thousands of New Mexico families," Pearce said. "I fully support this legislation that helps communities and schools thrive and excel."

While the House bill is widely expected to win passage today, a companion bill introduced in the Senate late Wednesday is expected to face a rockier path. Sen. Tom Harkin, D-Iowa, who is chairman of the Senate education committee, has said he would rather focus on retooling and reauthorizing the entire No Child Left Behind Act than considering standalone charter school legislation.

Udall said he appreciates that charter schools are good for some families, but agreed with Harkin's approach.

"He is evaluating the bill, but he prefers the Senate to thoughtfully consider and update No Child Left Behind to improve all schools, rather than focusing solely on charter schools in piecemeal legislation," Udall spokeswoman Jennifer Talhelm said.

A spokeswoman for Sen. Martin Heinrich, D-N.M., said the senator "has been supportive" of charter school innovations but wants to talk to New Mexico students and teachers before taking a position on the Senate bill.

[*] MURPHY: Good morning. I now convene this hearing to examine the implementation of the Affordable Care Act and enrollment of the state in federal exchanges here in the oversight and investigation committee--for the committee on energy and commerce. This sub- committee has a long history of trying to get straight answers from the administration on the status of the Affordable Care Act.

Two weeks before the launch of Healthcare.gov; the administration official responsible for the implementation of the ACA Exchanges told this committee that the website would be ready; consumers would be able to go online, shop for select plan and then enroll in coverage. When the federal exchange opened on October 1, consumers instead found a crashing website. The administration excuse for why the website didn't work: volume.

Through this committee's investigation we learned that the administration spent over half a billion dollars on a website that they had been warned for several months, would not be ready and would not work. The fact that the administration officials did not disclose when questioned by this committee during oversight hearings through 2013. Just after the failed launch we asked the administration on October 8th to provide enrollment data for the first week of healthcare.gov; debacle. The administration ignored us. Why? It wasn't because the data didn't exist; it was because the news wasn't good.

When Secretary Sebelius testified before the full energy and commerce committee on October 30th of last year; was asked about enrollment, she stated that she could not provide any data because the administration did not "have any reliable data around enrollment." The very next day, it was reported that there were only six successful enrollments on October 1st. We tried again during a hearing in January before the sub-committee when we asked the head of the office running the exchanges if the administration collected any data on who has paid their health coverage.

This administration official told us that they did not collect this information, "but we will be" as soon as it was finished building the website. While the administration refused to provide straightforward answers to our questions on enrollment, it continues to tout enrollment figures that included individuals who had merely selected a plan online.

When pressed by reporters for information on the number of enrollee's who had paid their premiums, a White House spokesman said that questions about payment "can best be directed to those private insurance companies that are collecting those payments." After months of an administration that refused to be transparent about enrollment, that's what we did. We did exactly what the administration suggested we do. On March 13th we sent a request to each insurance company in the Federal Marketplace and asked them to submit basic information: who selected a plan and who paid for it.

The data submitted by the Insurer's paints an uneven picture about the status of enrollment and payment through April 15th. As of that date, just 2/3 of enrollee's through the federally facilitated marketplace paid their first month premium. Some states are doing better than others. My home state of Pennsylvania, for example, has an 81 percent payment rate. Texas, on the other hand, is much lower at 42 percent. We recognize that many individuals still have time to pay their first month's premium, which is why we have asked the Insurers to update this information on May 20th.

As with any criticism or questions of the Affordable Care Act, the administration predictably protested and attempted to misrepresent the purpose of our inquiry. Let's be clear about why we had to engage in this exercise in the first place. The administration would not be transparent about enrollment and provide the underlying data. For the witnesses today, we ask you to be patient with our questions about enrollment and implementation. After months of promises about the status of Healthcare.gov from HHS officials, we have learned to be skeptical about blanket statements that everything is well.

One purpose of today's hearing is to examine enrollment because it is a key factor in measuring whether these exchanges are viable. We have a number of other questions for the witnesses today about the status of implementation. The ACA is more than a payment rate. We need to know if Americans can expect the premium reductions they were promised. We need to know if they can keep the plan they like. We need to know if they can keep their doctor. We cannot understand the status of the law and its implementation without hearing from you, the Insurance Companies, whose plans make up these exchanges.

Under the Presidents' Healthcare Law, these companies will receive Taxpayer dollars in the form of premium subsidy's and cost- sharing. We expect the witnesses today to provide the committee with facts and information about the first year of coverage under the Affordable Care Act. Thank you for--witnesses being here today and now I'd like to recognize the Ranking Member Ms. DeGette for five minutes.

DEGETTE: Thank you Mr. Chairman. I just want to take a few minutes since the Chairman has walked through the greatest hits of the problems they've had with the ACA, of where we stand now and where we stand after the first en--after the first enrollment period has just closed. So as we continue to get information about how the exchanges and the Affordable Care Act and the enrollment are performing, let's review what we already know.

The first thing is, despite the disastrous beginning of the net-- of the federal exchange; good news, the website was fixed. More than 8 million people signed up for insurance through the exchanges created through the affordable care act, which is more than a million more than we're originally projected before the disastrous unveiling. Now, of those 8 million people that waited to the last month of enrollment--of those 8 million people, 3 million of them waited till the last month of enrollment. And so their premiums are not due until April 30th or, in some cases, later than April 30th.

Even so, my colleagues, in their quest for knowledge on the other side of the aisle, sent out a questionnaire to insurers that manipulated the payment deadline to skew the understanding of how new insurance coverage is performing. How does that happen? Because they cut off the responses April 15th, at least two weeks before many of the premiums of these 3 million people were even due for payment. What this does is it skews the amount of people who are enrolled. Then, of course, they issued a press release post-haste.

Now, for years my friends on the other side of the aisle have made a series of claims that really are unsubstantiated. First, they claimed that the bill--(inaudible)--panels. Then they claimed that the bill would eliminate private insurance within three years. Then they claimed that the law would destroy millions of jobs. When they-- when the website was broken, they insisted the law would never meet enrollment goals.

Now, Mr. Chairman, today we finally have a chance to see in a snapshot, what's happening with the Affordable Care Act. And the facts reveal that every single one of those--of those claims were wrong. As of today, as I said, more than 8 million people enrolled in private plans through federal and state marketplaces. Millions more have enrolled through Medicaid and in off-exchange plans. Gallup just released a new poll finding that in the last six months the percentage of adults without insurance has dropped about 20 percent. And what that means is there are more than 11 million Americans with insurance today then there were 6 months ago.

Premiums are below the levels predicted by the Congressional Budget Office. And the agency has, once again, reiterated that the Affordable Care Act has slowed inflation and saved billions of dollars and will even reduce deficits. So by any rational reasonable measure, we can call this law success. And that success will make a real difference in people's lives. That's what's important here.

Yesterday, researches from the Harvard School of Public Health released a comprehensive study on the impacts of health insurance coverage. They were looking at mortality rates before and after the passage of Romney Care, the landmark Massachusetts health insurance expansion that served as an--as a model for the Affordable Care Act. They found that the mortality rate in Massachusetts fell by about 3 percent in the 4 years after passage of the state's health insurance law. And Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to put a copy of that study into the record.

MURPHY: Not an objection.

DEGETTE: Thank you. So if we can achieve that same level of success, nationwide, with the Affordable Care Act and there's no reason why we shouldn't be able to do so. That could result in 17,000 fewer deaths per year. That, Mr. Chairman, in a nutshell is what the Affordable Care Act means for Americans. Now, what I wish we could do in this sub-committee, and I've said this both publically and privately many, many times, is sit down with the ACA, figure out what the flaws are and figure out how we can work in a bipartisan way to fix it.

And that's what I think we should do. Instead, what we get is this misleading analysis last week, which said that only 67 percent of enrollees had paid for the coverage they enrolled in on the exchanges. And my--my Chairman, Mr. Upton, said, "The administrations rec--recent declarations of success may be unfounded." But, again, I will say the report was misleading because almost half of the enrollees in the healthcare exchanges, 40 percent of them, did not even have to make their initial premium payment until April 31st. I'm glad we've got the insurers here today to clear up this record. I'm glad we have everybody here to--to see exactly what we're talking about here.

So my suggestion is, let's look at the successes, let's look where we need to make improvements and let's work together to do just that. Thank you.

MURPHY: (Inaudible)--recommend the Chairman of the full committee, Mr. Upton, for five minutes.

MR. UPTON: With a friendly pat on the back, I'll just say April 31st has yet to come. 30 days has September, April, June and November. Thank you Mr. Chairman. I thank the witnesses for being here today as well, for sure. At this sub-committee our investigations are about getting the facts. A quest for transparency, the self-proclaimed most transparent administration in history has repeatedly dodged our simple questions about the healthcare law and refused the semblance of transparency about how its signature legislation--legislative achievement is or is not working.

We wanted the basic data from administration on enrollment one week after the launch of Healthcare.gov and the administration has rejected our request for more information each and every time. Members of the press have asked. The administration suggested the only way to get the facts was directly asking the insurance providers themselves. So we took their advice and we did just that, but the administration cried foul again.

We began asking about Healthcare.gov months before October 1st of last year. Repeatedly we were told that things were on track and working the way it was supposed to. We learned that this was not the case and the administration officials did everything in their power, it seems, to hide the chaos behind the scenes. The American public does deserve better. They deserve better than an administration that promised them $2500 in savings on healthcare premiums, only to see the cost rise sharply for many. They deserve better than an administration that repeated promises officials new that would be impossible to keep, promises that Americans could keep their doctors and keep their healthcare plans, also.

Like it or not, millions of Americans have found themselves with the unwelcome reality of cancellations and lost access to their trusted doctor. And one democratic colleague from Massachusetts said just two weeks ago, "The worst is yet to come." Today we are going to hear firsthand from the insurance providers about how implementation is working from their perspective. While the administration has declared this conversation over, the fact is that serious questions remain unanswered. And it is our responsibility to continue seeking the facts.

How many people have completed the enrollment process? Are the risks presented by these polls sustainable? How much more will premiums rise this next year? Is the back end of the website to be on track to be working by the next enrollment period? Are there any other delays or changes ahead that will disrupt the ability of families and businesses to plan for their healthcare coverage and needs? Will more healthcare plans be canceled in the coming years?

So what's wrong with seeking that information? Nothing that I know of. We released basic data points on enrollment as of April 15th and we'll do so again on the data that we collect through May 20th. The facts are the facts. And while the administration and its allies, furiously, try to muddy reality; the public deserves transparency. And while the administration toasts to the laws success with its Hollywood allies declaring this conversation over. We will continue our pursuit for facts for the American people so that we can finally have a full, accurate picture of this healthcare law. And I give the balance of my time to Dr. Burges.

DR. BURGES: I thank the Chairman for yielding. I thank our witnesses for being here today. I know it's not always easy or pleasant to come before this sub-committee. I, like the Chairman, wish that the administration would have been a little bit more forth coming about information, which would've obviated your need to be here today, but I do appreciate the fact that you responded to our request and that you have provided the data.

The fact remains the administration has withheld facts or changed facts during the roll out of this law. And that the federal agencies responsible for the implementation currently excel only in opacity. So you are here today to provide that transparency that the American people were promised earlier in this administration and I thank you for being here.

I have particular concern over one aspect and I will delve into it a little bit more during the questioning today, but that is the issue on the grace period, the 90 day period of time that is granted to people who are receiving the tax credits, the advanced tax credits for the offset of the cost of their insurance. If they don't pay their premium, in spite of the tax credit, they are given a grace period of 90 days. My understanding is that the companies will be responsible for the first 30 days; beyond that it will be the doctor, the hospital, the provider who submits the bill who may be on the hook for that.

And I am very interested to know what you have in development to keep practices, to keep providers apprised of the fact that a--a--a patients claim may be in a pending status when that claim is submitted. I know, from running a Doctors' Office, you always call and verify benefits, but now we have a new realm that we've entered into. Not only would you identify that somebody has been enrolled, but that they've paid and that they're current on their payments so that the provider in question would not be at risk.

So we will get into a little bit more on that in the question and answer period. I thank the Chairman for the time and yield back.

MURPHY: Gentleman, times expired. Now recognize the ranking member of the full-committee, Mr. Waxman for five minutes.

MR. WAXMAN: Thank you Mr. Chairman. Last week the republican whip, Representative Kevin McCarthy wrote an op-ed opposing the Affordable Care Act. He wrote, "President Obama needs to learn a simple lesson. Saying something doesn't make it true." Well, psychologists call this projection, a defense mechanism that involves ascribing your own behavior to others. In one phrase Representative McCarthy summed up five years of Republican opposition to the Affordable Care Act.

Over and over, Republican leaders have fabricated criticism of the Affordable Care Act and none of them have been true. Republican leaders said that the ACA would create death panels. Well, there are none in the law. Republican leaders said that the law was unconstitutional. The Supreme Court held exactly the opposite. Republican leaders said that the ACA would increase the deficit. Well, the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office found that the law will reduce deficits by over a trillion dollars.

Republican leaders said that the law would cause healthcare costs to sky rocket. In fact, in the 3 years after passage of the ACA, healthcare spending growth was at its lowest rate in 50 years. Republican leaders said that the law would cause massive job losses. In reality, there have been 48 consecutive months of job creation since the ACA was passed with more than 9.2 million jobs created. Republican leaders said there would be a huge loss of coverage under the law, but every independent analysis shows that the number of Americans with health insurance is growing and the number of uninsured, dropping rapidly.

Republicans said enrollment would fall short of CBO estimates because few Americans would sign up. At 8 million and growing, enrollment has exceeded everyone's expectations. Mr. Chairman, I just summarized 5 years of relentless republican opposition to the Affordable Care Act. It's a sad, and I believe, reprehensible record. The Republican Party is trying to scare families from getting the health insurance they need.

We saw the same pattern just last week when this committee released another report claiming imminent failure. This time, the report said that 1/3 of enrollees had not paid for coverage. There was just one problem. The data was incomplete, out of date and manipulated. Due to the late surge in enrollment, premiums were not even due for over 3 million Americans. The testimony we're going to hear today from the Insurers contradicts the Republican findings.

That testimony says that 80-90 percent of enrollees have paid their premiums. Mr. Chairman, it was a mistake to release those inaccurate and misleading findings and it's not the first time this is happened. This morning I released a memo describing the Republican record of distortion, exaggeration and misdirection. It's a sad record and I'd like to make it part of this hearing record. The simple fact is, despite 5 years of ceaseless opposition, the Affordable Care Act is working.

Over 8 million Americans have signed up for private healthcare coverage on the state and federal exchanges. Millions more have signed up for Medicaid. Premiums are well below CBO expectations. No American ever has to fear being discriminated against or denied coverage based on a pre-existing condition. No amount of blatant falsehoods and cynical partisan can obscure the facts. The Affordable Care Act is an enormous step forward in the health of our nation. And I yield back the balance of my time and I appreciate this opportunity to set the record straight.

MURPHY: Thank you. Gentleman yields back. We'll now move forward here with our witnesses. Just one moment please, because we went quicker and that's good. I just wasn't quite ready. So I'd like to introduce the panel for today's hearing. We have Mr. Mark Pratt who's a Senior Vice President of State Affairs for America's Health Insurance Plans. Mr. Frank Coyne is the Vice President of Operations and Chief Transformation Officer at Blue Cross Blue Shield Association. Mr. Paul Wingle--am I saying that correctly--is the executive Director of Individual Businesses and Public Exchange Operations and Strategy for Aetna. Mr. Brian Evanko is the President of Individual Segment for Cigna Health and Life Insurance Company. Mr. Darren--Mr. J. Darren Rodgers is the Senior Vice President and Chief Marketing Officer at the Healthcare Services Corporations. And Mr. Dennis Mathis is the President of Central Region and Exchange Strategy at Wellpoint, Inc.

I will now swear in the witnesses. You are aware that this committee is holding an investigative hearing and when doing say we have the practice of taking testimony under oath. Do any of you have any objections to testifying under oath? All the witnesses have indicated no. The Chair then advises you that under the rules of the house and the rules of the committee you are entitled to be advised by council. Do you desire to be advised by council during your testimony today? You do--are you saying--Mr. Wingle's saying you'd like to be advised by council? Well, if you're sitting by him that's fine.

Anybody else? You have council behind you. You certainly are welcome, at some point, to ask clarification from them, that's fine. In any case, would you all please rise and raise your right hand and I'll swear you in. Do you swear the testimony you are about to give is of truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth? Thank you. You may be seated. All the witnesses have taken that oath and you are now under oath and subject to the penalties set forth in title 18, section 1001 of the United States Code. We'll have you now each give a 5 minute opening statement, please. Stick to the 5 minutes. You'll see a red light go on when you're at the end of your time. Mr. Pratt, you may begin.

MR. PRATT: Chairman Murphy, Ranking Member DeGette and members of the sub-committee, I am Mark Pratt, Senior Vice President of State Affairs in America's Health Insurance Plans. I lead AHIPs Legislative and Regulatory activities in the states including implementation of the Affordable Care Act and our work with the National Association of Insurance Commissioners. We appreciate this opportunity to testify on enrollment on the new health insurance exchanges and implementation of the ACA.

Our written testimony focuses on two broad areas. One, our members experience in the ACAs initial open enrollment period for 2014 and two, our members priorities for improving access to high quality affordable health coverage in 2015 and beyond. Since the enactment of the ACA, our members have been working to implement the laws, many requirements with a strong focus on delivering high-value coverage options for consumers.

Helping them obtain the secure affordable coverage they need has been our central goal throughout the implementation process. While working on operational issues related to ACA implementation and providing recommendations to policy makers; our members have focused on several major goals. Among them, minimizing disruptions for consumers, businesses and stake holders; ensuring the workability of the exchanges and allowing state flexibility; maximizing choice and competition and addressing specific ACA provisions to make health coverage more affordable.

On numerous issues, our members have provided technical systems and expertise to assist federal agencies in resolving the operational challenges that surrounded the launch of the new exchanges and healthcare.gov website. They've devoted significant resources to performing manual processes and workarounds that were necessitated by the problems following the October 1 launch.

Despite the challenges our members encountered, we are proud that they ultimately were successful in offering a broad range of high- value coverage options to consumers who were enrolled in exchanges in 2014. HHS has reported that approximately 8 million individuals signed up for exchange plans during the initial open enrollment period for 2014. While uncertainty remains with respect to how many people have paid their first months premium, health insurers have been doing everything possible to encourage exchange enrollees to pay their premiums.

In the coming weeks we anticipate that there will be greater clarity in the question of how many exchange enrollees have paid their premiums. The number of individual plans have publicly announced the preliminary data and we anticipate that more announcements will be forthcoming. However, it may be a period of time before system-wide numbers and premium payments are available. Our members will continue their ongoing outreach to encourage exchange enrollees to pay their premiums.

Looking forward, we continue to believe that affordability must be the central priority as we focus on further expanding access to high quality affordable health coverage--health insurance coverage in 2015 and beyond. One critically important step that congress can take to make coverage more affordable is to delay the ACA health insurance tax and eventually repeal it. We are deeply concerned that this tax is undermining efforts to control cost and provide affordable coverage options.

We strongly support bipartisan legislation to fully repeal the tax introduced by Representatives Boustany and Matheson and cosponsored by 230 house members. We also support, as a short-term solution, separate bipartisan legislation that proposes a two year delay in the tax. On another front and in closing, we have worked closely with our members to provide comments to federal agencies on dozens of proposed rules and other regulatory documents. We consistently have emphasized the importance of creating a regulatory environment that promotes a wide range of affordable coverage options. Thank you again for this opportunity to testify. I look forward to your questions.

MURPHY: Thank you Mr. Pratt--(inaudible)--now we recognize Mr. Coyne for his 5 minutes. Thank you.

MR. COYNE: Good morning Chairman Murphy, Ranking Member DeGette and members of the sub-committee. Thank you for the invitation to testify here today. I am Frank Coyne, Vice President in the Office of the President for the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association, which represents the 37 independent community bases Blue Cross and Blue Shield Companies that collectively provide health coverage for 100 million Americans.

Blue Cross and Blue Shield Companies offer health care coverage in every zip code in the coverage and have long been committed to offering consumers across the country a wide variety of insurance options. My remarks today focus on the Blues participation in the multi-state plan program administered by the Office of Personnel Management and enrollment in Blue Cross and Blue Shield MSP plans. The Affordable Care Act authorizes OPM to contract with at least two entities; at least one of which must be a not for profit to offer products on the state and federal market places.

Under this multi-state plan program, OPM certifies health plans in conjunction with states for placement on the exchanges. For 2014, OPM certified Blue Cross and Blue Shield Companies to offer multi- state plan products in 30 states and the District of Columbia. Collectively, Blue Cross and Blue Shield Companies offer more than 150 multi-state plan products.

OPM has developed a standard contract for OPM issuers that meet its requirements. The association is party to the contract with OPM and our Blue licensee plans have agreements with us to fulfill many aspects of that contract such as customer enrollment, benefits and claims administration and customer service, among other activities. In addition, the contract contains a requirement to report enrollment information to OPM.

In order to fulfill this requirement, we ask Blue plans to report information on their multi-state plan enrollments to us and we convey enrollment information to OPM. As of April 1st, 2014 a total of 283,783 individuals an MSP plan. I appreciate the opportunity to discuss Blue participation in enrollment in the MSP plan and I look forward to your questions.

MURPHY: Thank you, Mr. Coyne. Now, Mr. Wingle you're recognized for 5 minutes. Does your--move it close--move it as close as you can get it.

MR. WINGLE: Oh sure. Thank you. Good morning Chairman Murphy, Ranking Member DeGette and distinguished members of the sub-committee. My name is Paul Wingle and I am Executive Director of Individual Business and Public Exchange Operations and Strategy at Aetna. Thank you for inviting us to today's hearing. I have a brief opening statement and will then be happy to answer any questions you may have.

Aetna is currently participating in the individual market on the exchanges in 17 states. Over the course of approximately the last two months, Aetna has worked with the sub-committee to provide requested data and information related to enrollment in plans offered through federally facilitated market places. As of the third week of April, Aetna had over 600,000 members who had enrolled and roughly 500,000 members who had paid. For those who had reached their payment due date, the payment rate, though dynamic, has been in the low to mid 80 percent range.

As outlined in our prior submissions to the sub-committee, these are dynamic figures and do not reflect final enrollment numbers as some enrollees have not yet reached their payment due dates. An example would be a member with the June 1 policy effective date who has not yet paid, but whose initial payment is not yet due.

We're happy to continue to work with the subcommittee to provide updated information and data and note that as a subcommittee is recognized, this might include material, nonpublic, confidential and proprietary information. Thank you again for the opportunity to be here today, and I will be happy to answer any questions you may have.

MURPHY: Thank you, Mr. Wingle. Yield back.

And now Mr. Evanko. You're recognized for five minutes.

EVANKO: Chairman Murphy, Ranking Member DeGette, members of the subcommittee. Good morning. And thank you for the opportunity to testify at this hearing on PPACA enrollment in the insurance industry.

I'm Brian Evanko, and I currently serve as president of the U.S. Individual Segment at Cigna Corporation. I oversee the operation tasks with developing, promoting and maintaining the Cigna products that are offered in the individual health market.

Including those products that are offered on the exchanges set up pursuant to the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act or ACA. Cigna's a global health services company dedicated to helping people improve their health, well-being and sense of security. Through its subsidiaries, Cigna offers an integrated suite of health services, such as medical, dental, behavioral health, pharmacy and vision care benefits, along with other related products, including group disability, life and accident coverage.

We employ more than 26,000 people and have sales capability in 30 countries and jurisdictions. We manage more than 80 million customer relationships throughout the world. Despite our large footprint, 80 percent of Cigna's overall healthcare business consists of administrative services. This means that we help employers to administer their policies.

We also administer claims processes, which are not risk-based like traditional insurance. Many of the employers that we assist are self-insuring, and the claim payments come out of the employers' own funds.

Cigna's traditional insurance business is concentrated in a large group market. We have a very limited presence in the individual market, including on the ACA exchanges. The individual market currently constitutes approximately three percent of Cigna's total revenue. We currently offer health insurance products on the exchanges in five states, four of which, Arizona, Florida, Tennessee and Texas, are federally facilitated marketplaces. The only state run exchange in which Cigna's participating is in Colorado.

We have entered the exchanges on a focused basis in 2014 to gather deeper learning about consumer behaviors in the individual market, to understand the operational implications of how the exchanges function, and as a potential longer term source of growth for Cigna.

For 2014, we did not expect the exchanges to have a significant financial impact on our company. The health insurance marketplace is evolving rapidly, and Cigna, like other health insurance companies, is constantly challenged to maintain affordability, accessibility and consumer choice in its product offerings. Cigna has worked collaboratively with our clients and customers, healthcare professionals, state and federal regulators, as well as other stakeholders to maintain our heritage of providing high quality health insurance products and services while adapting to the ACA and other statutory and regulatory changes.

We believe that healthcare is a shared responsibility of the individual, the private sector, the medical community and the government. Accordingly, we look forward to how we can all work together to improve the health and wellness of, and the quality of care for, all Americans. I welcome any questions you may have.

MURPHY: Mr. Evanko, yield back.

And it'll go to Mr. Rodgers to be recognized up to five minutes.

RODGERS: Good morning, Chairman Murphy. Good morning, Chairman Murphy, and members of the subcommittee. I'm Darren Rodgers.

(CROSSTALK)

RODGERS: Good morning again, everyone. I'm Darren Rodgers. I'm Senior Vice President and Chief Marketing Officer at Healthcare Service Corporation or HCSC. HCSC is a mutual legal reserve company, which does business as Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Illinois, Montana, New Mexico, Oklahoma and Texas. HCSC is the largest customer-owned, nonprofit health insurance company in the nation.

We're headquartered in Chicago, Illinois, with a workforce of nearly 20,000 employees, serving nearly 14 million members throughout our five state Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans. For over 80 years, HCSC has been committed to expanding access to cost-effective healthcare to as many people as possible in every part of each of our five states. Whether through employer sponsored insurance, government programs or individual products, HCSC is committed to its purpose and to offering our customers a wide range of cost-effective and sustainable product choices to meet the needs of -- to meet their health and wellness needs.

As we transition to a new healthcare marketplace, HCSC remains committed to its individual and small employer markets in continuing to offer accessible products, particularly to those individuals who do not have access to employer-sponsored coverage. We're proud of what our brands stand for, security and peace of mind, in our commitment to the communities in which we operate, as well as our large and geographically diverse network of healthcare providers in our operating states. This allows us to offer a variety of affordable product choices in every county of every state in which we operate.

To support our individual and small employer market, HCSC participated in the health insurance exchanges. We offered a similar portfolio of products both on and off exchange, with a variety of deductibles, copays, coverages and other options, with the goal of meeting our members' diverse healthcare needs.

At the current time, enrollment and payment information can only be presented as of each day when the numbers are counted. As such, there are natural lags between the effective date of coverage and the date on which the members' coverage payment may be due. For instance, applicants with policies with an effective date of May 1, still have time remaining in their payment deadline.

In addition, adjustments and reconciliations to this data are ongoing. The data HCSC is providing represents our good faith estimate based on our records to date. With these caveats, HCSC received between October 1, 2013 and April 15, 2014, approximately 830,000 applications across our five states, comprised of approximately 600,000 on exchange and 230,000 off exchange applications. We estimate that these 830,000 applications represent coverage for just over 1.2 million applicants.

In the written copy of my opening statement we provided a snapshot of our current first month payment rates. As you can see, January through April look fairly consistent and range from 83 to 93 percent. The payment rates for May are currently less, because payments are still coming in and being posted.

HCSC is, and always has been, committed to improving access to quality of care for all Americans. I thank you on behalf of HCSC for the opportunity to be a part of this important discussion.

MURPHY: Ladies and gentlemen, now Mr. Mathis here recognized for five minutes.

MATHIS: Chairman Murphy, Ranking Member DeGette, and members of the House Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations. Thank you for the opportunity to be here today on behalf of WellPoint. I am Dennis Mathis, president of the Central Region and Exchange Strategy. I'm responsible for creating WellPoint's exchange strategy and overseeing its launch. Prior to my current role, I was president of Anthem Blue Cross and Blue Shield in Missouri.

WellPoint is one of the nation's leading health benefit companies. We believe that our health connects us all. So we focus on being a valued health partner and delivering quality products and services that give members access to the care they need. With nearly 67 million people served by our affiliated companies, including nearly 37 million enrolled in our family health plans, we can make a real difference to meet the needs of our diverse constituents.

We are an independent licensee of the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association. We serve members as the Blue Cross licensee for California, and as the Blue Cross and Blue Shield licensee for Colorado, Connecticut, Georgia, Indiana, Kentucky, Maine, Missouri, Nevada, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Virginia and Wisconsin.

In most of these service areas, our plans do business as Anthem Blue Cross, Anthem Blue Cross and Blue Shield, Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Georgia, and Empire Blue Cross Blue Shield or Empire Blue Cross. We also serve customers in other states through our Amerigroup and CareMore subsidiaries.

WellPoint is currently operating in the federally facilitated exchange, which includes Georgia, Indiana, Maine, Missouri, New Hampshire, Ohio, Virginia and Wisconsin. We also participate in several state-based exchanges, including California, Colorado, Connecticut, Kentucky, New York and Nevada.

While there is no doubt that implementation of the exchanges presents a complex and daunting undertaking, we believe we've been able to apply our knowledge and experience to make the system work better for our members. We are seeing strong membership growth, and large percentages of our newly enrolled customers are successfully paying their premiums by the due date.

Our most important priority through all of the complexity of ACA implementation is to ensure that our members receive the best possible care. Working closely and collaboratively with the physician community, our innovative programs, from new payment models to telehealth solutions, to sophisticated data analytics that arm physicians with better information, we are creating value for our members, for physicians and for the healthcare system. We are proud of the work we are doing to transform healthcare.

WellPoint was pleased to provide the committee last month with enrollment data from October 1, 2013, through April 20 -- April 15, 2014, for states where we participate in the federally facilitated exchange.

As we stated to the committee at the time of submission, this data is not final, and only represents a snapshot in time. The data included enrollees whose policies have effective dates of April 1, May 1, and June 1, which means that premiums for such policies would not be due until April 10, May 10, and June 10, respectively.

Also, the reported enrollment and premium payment data is subject to adjustments. For examples, enrollees may elect to drop their coverage, elect to change the effective date of their coverage after submission of their application, or continue to enroll through special enrollment periods.

In response to the committee's request, we submitted the total number of applications received for enrollment in the federally facilitated exchange during the period October 1, 2013, through April 15, 2014. The percentage of applications that have paid a premium will differ depending on whether the percentages calculated based on the total number of applications and premium payments received during this entire period, roughly 70 percent, or as calculated based on the total number of applications and premium payments received for policies whose premium deadline has passed. Ranging up to 90 percent, depending on the state.

WellPoint feels privileged to be able to serve our growing community of members. We take great pride in transforming healthcare with trusted, caring, creative and innovative solutions. I thank the committee for the opportunity to testify today on behalf of WellPoint, and look forward to your questions.

MURPHY: Thank you. Well, just for record, all the witnesses did not go over time, and we'll make sure we fill in the gaps here, which was -- not been provided to us. And see if we can get some information.

Do any of you, particularly from the insurance companies, do any of you have -- I'm recognizing myself for five minutes, by the way, have any data among those people who're subscribed, is if the cost their paying for their overall health insurance plan is more, less or the same as they were paying in a previous year? Mr. Wingle, does your, do you keep, that data?

WINGLE: I don't have that data available.

MURPHY: Mr. Evanko? Do you know if you might have some?

EVANKO: I don't have specific figures to share. I can try to provide some context.

MURPHY: Would you submit that for the record? Mr. Rodgers, Mr. Mathis, do your plans keep that record of what people paid in the previous year versus what they're paying now?

RODGERS: No, I haven't looked.

MURPHY: Thank you. And of those who have signed up for insurance, do any of your companies ask for, have any data, if people were among those who had lost their insurance? That is, their insurance was canceled because it changed in the Affordable Care Act. Any of you from insurance companies? Any of you have that data?

WINGLE: No. EVANKO: We currently do not have that information available.

MURPHY: OK. And all right. Thank you. So we don't know if the people who are signing up for these health insurance plans are people who are renewing insurance, had lost insurance, or never had insurance; am I correct? Mr. Wingle, Mr. Evanko, Mr. Rodgers, Mathis? OK.

EVANKO: That's correct.

MATHIS: No.

MURPHY: I know Secretary Sebelius said that she did not think we had that data either.

Mr. Wingle, your Chief Executive, Mark Bertolini, said that premium rates in 2015 will range from very low single digits to some that will be over double digits. Can consumers expect this for their 2015 premiums?

WINGLE: It's important to recognize, first of all, that we're at the start of the rate filing and approval process, so we're very early in the process of establishing those rates and submitting them to state regulators for approval and review. Our rates, it's also important to understand, reflect a number of key factors, most importantly the benefits covered by the plans we're filing, the population covered by those plans, and the underlying healthcare costs in the geographies where those plans are offered. There will be some variability across geography and depending on those circumstances.

MURPHY: Some might face double-digit increases. We don't know yet, you're saying?

WINGLE: I can't say for certain whether some will pay double digits, single digits, or no increase at all. It's too early to say.

MURPHY: If there's no increase in insurance, we should all celebrate, because I'm not sure that has existed in my lifetime.

(OFF-MIKE)

MURPHY: What's that?

(OFF-MIKE)

MURPHY: Will there -- will there be decreases?

WINGLE: It's hard to say. It'll vary by geography and ratings.

MURPHY: All right. Mr. Mathis, you announced your quarterly earnings and notice that the ramp-up in the fee of government is charging insurers under the healthcare law would impact marketplace premiums next year. What can consumers expect?

MATHIS: So similar to my colleague's comment, we are in the process of developing our rates now for the 138 rating regions in which we do business across the 14 states. So I don't have exact numbers yet, Chairman, in terms of what our rate increases are going to be. Certainly inputs into that are the experience that we're developing through the population that we're serving, the expected medical trend that's going to occur, and then the fees and taxes that occur through the ACA and through state and other federal constructs. That all goes into the right construct process.

MURPHY: I think I'm going down the same hall with each of you, so let me cut to the chase. The bottom line here is you do get, for risk corridors, you do get some money back from the federal government to balance out some of your costs; am I correct? With each plan? Mr. Evanko, is that true?

EVANKO: Risk corridors, as you know, sir, are part of the three R's. We, at Cigna Corporation, are not expecting in material, receivable or payable, as it relates to risk corridors.

MURPHY: I'm -- my point is that as we're looking at this data, and we'll continue to monitor, and we recognize some of this is too preliminary, based upon who has signed up and what their healthcare costs are. For example, if we don't reach, if you don't reach the 40 percent number that the president had hoped, of people between 18 and 35, and mostly those who signed up have been older and sicker, then that's going to have an impact upon your plan cost. Am I correct, Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Could -- could you restate that question?

MURPHY: That if people who have signed up are not the young, healthy invincibles, but are, indeed, the older folks who have preexisting conditions and other healthcare costs, that you're gonna have to face some sort of increase in premiums; am I correct?

RODGERS: Well, as two of my colleagues have said, the rates that we file for 2015 haven't been finalized yet, but those will reflect...

(CROSSTALK)

MURPHY: Understand. I'm anticipating.

(CROSSTALK)

RODGERS: ... cost...

(CROSSTALK)

MURPHY: You've been in the business for a while. And the federal government does provide some funds for -- for you to help balance these out; am I correct? There's, federal money, comes to help as the risk corridors and you have other people there who increase cost (inaudible); am I correct?

RODGERS: The three R's program does exist to provide...

MURPHY: Right.

RODGERS: ... some guardrails. We have not...

MURPHY: But over time, that amount of money from the federal government will decline; am I correct?

RODGERS: Some of those programs are traditional, transitional, and one's permanent.

MURPHY: I understand. But we're going to, we'll get back to this. Thank you.

I yield, recognize, Miss DeGette for five minutes.

DEGETTE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Last week, the majority republicans on this committee put out a report stating that only 67 percent of the people who signed up for insurance through the state and federal marketplaces has paid their first month's premiums and then had a big press blitz about that, saying that Obamacare had once again failed. So I -- I kind of want to walk some of you through that allegation and see how true it is.

I want to start with you, Mr. Mathis. I believe that the press reports I've seen, the reports from the administration, show that -- that through the end of March, which was the deadline, about 8.1 people enrolled through either the federal or state exchanges. Is that correct, to your knowledge?

MATHIS: Did you mean 8.1 million?

DEGETTE: Yes.

MATHIS: Yes.

DEGETTE: And -- and...

MATHIS: I -- I have the same source of data that -- that you do on that point.

DEGETTE: That's fine. Now, in your -- in your testimony, you said that the data used in that republican analysis, quote, "included enrollees whose policies have effective dates of April 1, May 1, and June 1." Is that correct?

MATHIS: Yes.

DEGETTE: And that's about three million out of eight million people, about 40 percent; is that correct?

MATHIS: Again, since we didn't enroll all eight million people, I can't attest to that question or not.

DEGETTE: But -- okay. Well, I will say what I've seen is it's about three million out of eight million. Now, so the three million people who enrolled, or let me just say, the people who enrolled in March, they had coverage, in general, that began no -- no earlier than May 1; is that right? MATHIS: If you enrolled in March, you would have potentially an effective date, depending on what day of the month you enrolled in. Could be April 1. Could've been May 1.

DEGETTE: May 1. And so those people's premiums were not due until, at the earliest, the end of April; is that correct? If you enrolled March 31, your premiums were due at the end of April, or later, right?

MATHIS: To help facilitate members enrolling, what we have done at WellPoint is actually extended the payment period 10 days beyond last day of...

(CROSSTALK)

DEGETTE: So it could -- it could be...

MATHIS: ... month.

DEGETTE: ... April 30 or it could even be later, correct?

MATHIS: So an April 1...

DEGETTE: "Yes," or "No," will work.

MATHIS: An April 1 effective...

DEGETTE: Right.

MATHIS: ... could actually have until May 10 to pay their premiums.

DEGETTE: OK. Now, Mr. Mathis, let me ask you. Your testimony said for WellPoint ACA policies whose deadline for paying premiums has passed, about 90 percent had paid their premiums; is that correct?

MATHIS: So our data in our...

DEGETTE: You can say "Yes," or "No." That's what your testimony said.

MATHIS: Yes. So it...

DEGETTE: OK. Now, that's more than 67 percent; is that correct?

MATHIS: Last time I looked, yeah.

DEGETTE: OK.

MATHIS: It's been greater than 67.

DEGETTE: Now, Mr. Wingle, let me -- let me take you off the hot seat, Mr. Mathis.

Mr. Wingle, I want to ask you. Aetna has shown, of the -- of the five to six hundred enrollees who have paid, about 85 percent up until March paid their premiums; is that correct?

WINGLE: Our range is in the low to mid-80s month to month.

DEGETTE: OK. And that's also more than 67 percent, isn't it?

WINGLE: Empirically, yes.

DEGETTE: Yes. And Mr. Rodgers, let me ask you for your company. The ACA payment policies whose premium payment deadlines have passed, about 83 to 85 percent of them have paid their premiums; is that correct?

RODGERS: Except for the most recent month.

DEGETTE: The ones whose payment deadlines have passed.

RODGERS: Yes, that's correct.

DEGETTE: Yes. And that's also more than 67 percent, isn't it?

RODGERS: That is more than 67 percent.

DEGETTE: Yeah. So -- so what I wanted to -- to ask about -- what I wanted to ask about is do any of you expect to see substantially lower payment percentages than you saw historically? Before the latest enrollment? Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: So I -- I will give a little context to my answer.

DEGETTE: OK. I -- I need a "Yes," or "No." I don't have much time. I'm sorry.

MATHIS: Well...

(CROSSTALK)

DEGETTE: Do you expect to see it go down to 67 percent for April?

MATHIS: I don't think we have enough information to know exactly ...

DEGETTE: OK.

MATHIS: ... where it's going to be.

DEGETTE: OK. Well, Mr. Rodgers, let me ask you this question then. Mr. Upton said that he thinks suddenly maybe they won't pay for their enrollment in March. So I wanted to kind of go through, because you've got a nice chart in your testimony, and it shows the -- the payments month by month that people made when they enrolled. So for 1-1-2014, on the exchange, 85 percent of the people paid; is that correct?

RODGERS: That's correct.

DEGETTE: For 2-1-2014, 86 percent paid, correct?

RODGERS: That's correct.

DEGETTE: For 3-1-2014, 88 percent paid; is that correct?

RODGERS: Yes.

DEGETTE: And for 4-1-2014, 83 percent paid; is that correct?

RODGERS: That is correct.

DEGETTE: And you're still waiting for everybody else to pay the -- because their deadline has not passed yet; is that correct?

RODGERS: That's correct.

DEGETTE: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

MURPHY: And can I just follow up with a clarifying question. When she asked about historical data, were you referring to the last couple months or a comparison with previous years under different plans?

BLACKBURN: Well, we didn't have an exchange.

MURPHY: No, no. I -- I just...

DEGETTE: Chairman, we only just got the exchange.

MURPHY: No. I -- I wasn't sure if you meant under historical, you mean previous years of plans, versus just the exchange.

BLACKBURN: No. (Inaudible).

DEGETTE: Chairman, what I mean is since -- since the ACA...

MURPHY: OK.

DEGETTE: ... was implemented starting on October ...

MURPHY: Thank you. I just wanted clarification on that.

Now recognizing Miss Blackburn for five minutes.

BLACKBURN: Thank you all so much for being with us. I want to stay with this issue on the premiums, because we get asked about this a lot.

So Mr. Wingle? Aetna. Your CEO said the premium increases will vary over 17 states and encompass 100 -- 132 rating areas, correct?

WINGLE: That is correct.

BLACKBURN: OK. Can you identify where premiums will decrease in 2015? What identification can you place on that? WINGLE: At this point in the filing season, we can't offer any guidance on or speculate on where they're going to fall. We're still gathering the information pile.

BLACKBURN: None?

WINGLE: I -- I can't say none.

BLACKBURN: OK.

WINGLE: I can't say any.

BLACKBURN: Mr. Mathis? Can you tell me any, identify any states, where you are offering products in the exchanges where consumers can expect a premium decrease?

MATHIS: At this juncture we do not have the information.

BLACKBURN: You don't have the information?

MATHIS: No. The filing -- the filing rates are -- are due starting in late May into June, and so we have not computed yet with any certainty what the actual rates are going to look like in our 138 rating regions.

BLACKBURN: OK. Lot of uncertainty floating around out there. OK. Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: I -- I would echo my colleagues' comments. We're in the process of making decisions. Some decisions on certain assumptions been made, but most assumptions are still to be determined, so ...

BLACKBURN: So you don't know if your consumers are going to see any decreases. You know, they were promised decreases through the Affordable Care Act. So OK.

Mr. Rodgers? To you.

RODGERS: As the company's marketing officer, I can tell you I'm not involved in rate setting, but I'm aware of some of the deadlines we're facing, which are generally toward the end of June...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: OK. Well, let me ask you all this then. Have any of you conducted any internal analysis of what your organization's premiums are going to look like in 2015? Do any of you have any internal analysis? Raise your hand for me.

So you all have conducted no -- we've got some of our nation's biggest insurers and you have done no internal analysis on what the trend line is for these premiums? None? Oh ...

EVANKO: Miss Blackburn...

BLACKBURN: ... Mr. Evanko. Have at it. EVANKO: I -- I'd like to just clarify our comments here a little bit, at least my comments, as it relates to this issue. So the decisions related to this are very complicated, and they impact each individual a little bit differently, because of where someone's located, maybe what their APTC eligibility is, et cetera. So there's a long list of reasons there.

BLACKBURN: Right. We -- we understand that. You're talking about a 2300 page law that became about over 20,000 pages of rules and regulations, and we know this changes daily. We appreciate the predicament that you are in. We also appreciate the predicament that our constituents find themselves in. And it is baffling that we can have some of our nation's largest ensures, and you all don't have any internal analysis as to what these rates are -- I thought that reading your reports you all did analysis and trend lines for the near-term, the mid-term and the long-term and you looked at what the expectations were so that your stakeholders would all be aware of what was happening within that market.

You know, has anybody done any kind of analysis?

MATHIS: Can I (inaudible)?

BLACKBURN: Yes, please. Have at it, Mr. Mathis. Your mike, please.

MATHIS: So analysis is typically ongoing in our organization. Rate development typically takes three to six months to occur, once you have credible information. And so just for context purposes, we, as has been stated earlier in this meeting ...

BLACKBURN: OK. Let me ask...

MATHIS: Let me please finish.

BLACKBURN: OK. Go ahead.

MATHIS: We are just now understanding what membership we have attracted.

BLACKBURN: OK.

MATHIS: And so the work is ongoing.

BLACKBURN: OK.

MATHIS: But it has not been finalized. And that...

BLACKBURN: OK. Let me ask you this.

MATHIS: ... that's the important point.

BLACKBURN: What has been prepared for your CEO?

MATHIS: At...

BLACKBURN: Any of you.

MATHIS: At this juncture, we do not have a compiled package to sit down and say, "Here's what we believe a rate is going to be in..."

BLACKBURN: OK.

MATHIS: "... any of our 130...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: When do you expect to have that?

MATHIS: Typically it will be towards the end of this month. As rates need to be filed in our state starting end of May through the June-July time period.

BLACKBURN: OK. Would you submit that to us for the record, each of you? Do you agree? To submit this for the record so that we will have this?

(UNKNOWN): OK. I -- in representative, I want to concur with my colleague, we are constantly analyzing our exchange experience. This is a new population. We don't have a long claims record or history we have from the -- we had in the previous market. So the more data we get, the better, and more confident we feel as we propose rates. It's an ongoing analysis. It's a constant.

BLACKBURN: OK. We appreciate that, and we would like to have that analysis and the information you have as you get it and ask that you please stay in touch with us and do those orderly insertions for the record.

I yield back, Mr. Chairman.

MURPHY: Gentleman (sic) yields back. And now recognized, Mr. Dingell for five minutes.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, I thank you for your courtesy, and I thank you for the hearing.

I'm pleased the committee's examining the first open enrollment period under the Affordable Care Act. I would like to examine the staff report where it claims only 67 percent of Obamacare enrollees have paid their first month's premium. We're going to find out whether that's so and what -- what it means.

The bottom line, I think, is the ACA is working. After a turbulent start, we got the website up and running, and HHS now reports that eight million people have selected plans through the exchanges.

Furthermore, some 4.8 million people are enrolled in Medicaid and gyp (ph). And that number would be much higher if all 50 states chose to expand Medicaid. CBO estimates that another five million people purchased ACA compliant plans outside the marketplaces. Finally, Gallup just found that the percentage of Americans who do not have health insurance fell to 13.4 percent, down from some 18 percent one year ago. So let's examine and see what goes on.

This question to Mr. Mathis. And "Yes," or "No," if you please. When WellPoint turned over enrollment figures to the majority, you did this under the caveat that the data was not final and only represented a snapshot in time; is that correct?

MATHIS: Yes, it is.

DINGELL: Yes?

MATHIS: Yes.

DINGELL: Now, this question, again, to you, Mr. Mathis. And that is because the committee only requested data through April 15, 2014; is that correct?

MATHIS: Yes, it is.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Mathis, is it correct that the people who signed up after May 15 may not have to pay their premium until later in April, May or even June? Yes or no?

MATHIS: Is there anybody after April 15 would have longer time?

DINGELL: That's -- who signed up after March 15?

MATHIS: Yes.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Mathis, is it correct that nearly 90 percent of WellPoint's customers whose premium deadline has passed have already paid their first month's premium? Yes or no?

MATHIS: Yes, it is.

DINGELL: Now, in your experience, have you found that people are more likely to make their premium payment right before the deadline?

MATHIS: That is typically human nature, sir.

DINGELL: And we -- we know that from the behavior of Americans with regard to income tax and things like that.

Now, this question is for Mr. Wingle of Aetna. Is it correct that according to your best estimate, roughly 80 percent of Aetna beneficiaries who've reached their payment due date have paid their first month's premium; yes or no?

WINGLE: Month to month it ranges from the low to mid-80s.

DINGELL: Say it again?

WINGLE: It ranges from the low to mid-80s month by month.

DINGELL: Thank you.

Now, this question for you, Mr. Coyne of Blue Cross Blue Shield. Is it correct that according to your best estimate, 80 to 85 percent of the individuals buying Blue Cross Blue Shield plans through the marketplace have paid their first months' premiums? Yes or no?

COYNE: Yes, that is correct.

DINGELL: I'm not hearing you, sir.

COYNE: Yes, that is correct. Based on...

DINGELL: That's correct.

COYNE: ... a report we...

(CROSSTALK)

DINGELL: Now, gentlemen, it doesn't take, I think, a genius, or an atomic physicist, to figure out the numbers we just heard from the -- and actual insurance companies greatly differ from the staff report. I hope everyone will take these companies at their word, instead of falling for smoke and mirrors from my friends on the other side of the aisle. I can understand why my friends on the other side of the aisle are not in attendance, because they would get a very unpleasant taste of fact, which they might not like.

My old daddy taught me, he used to say to me, "Son, figures don't lie, but liars can figure." And I've always thought that it would be a good thing when this committee does its business, that we know what we're doing, that we deal in hard facts, so that when the legislation that we work on, the laws that we are dealing with, the oversight in which we engage, actually lead us to truth and correct response, so that public policies may be mounted on fact rather than fiction, and on staff reports that mislead all. I would suggest that the staff reports should be reviewed with the utmost of care, and deposited then very carefully in the nearest large wastebasket.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

MURPHY: Gentleman yields back. Now recognize the Vice Chair of the committee, Mr. Burgess, or Dr. Burgess, for five minutes.

BURGESS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I thank you for the recognition.

Remind the chairman emeritus that we are friends. Let me ask you a question. April 17, the day the president came out with Mission Accomplished speech at the White House in the press briefing, there was a briefing of executives of your companies; is that correct? Anyone is free to answer.

MATHIS: I believe -- I believe that was correct, sir.

WINGLE: Yes.

BURGESS: Mm-hm. And was your company represented?

EVANKO: I'm not sure which particular meeting you're describing, but I -- I know there have been some.

BURGESS: Well, let me give you the particular meeting. It was on April the 17th, at 1:35 p.m. The president and vice president meet with insurance executives in the Roosevelt Room. Did that meeting take place?

MATHIS: WellPoint was present at that meeting, sir.

BURGESS: WellPoint was present. Was Cigna present?

EVANKO: Our CEO was not present at that meeting.

BURGESS: Was not. OK.

EVANKO: I'm advised that our CEO was not present at that meeting.

BURGESS: And was Blue Cross?

WINGLE: That's Aetna, for me.

BURGESS: Was Blue Cross represented at the meeting?

COYNE: I -- I don't have that information right now.

BURGESS: Well, for -- for those that were...

RODGERS: And just for the record, I'm advised that (inaudible) president was present at the meeting.

PRATT: Yeah. And I -- I don't -- I can't remember the exact date of those meetings, but I can tell you that when we're called to the White House, generally we would attempt to be there.

BURGESS: Was April 17. And I would think you'd remember. It's a pretty big deal. I mean, I haven't had a meeting with the president and vice president.

BLACKBURN: Will the gentlemen yield? Perhaps...

BURGESS: No, I will not.

BLACKBURN: ... they could answer were they there?

BURGESS: No, I will not. My time is -- my time is limited. What I would like from those that answered affirmatively, Mr. Mathis and Mr. Pratt, can you provide us information as to what was covered in that meeting? Who made the presentation, how long it was, and was there, in fact, time for there to be question and answer? Was it simply a presentation to you from the president and vice president?

MATHIS: Mr. Congressman, I was not personally present at that meeting. Our CEO was, and I do not know the facts of the meeting.

BURGESS: Would -- would you make an attempt to answer for me those questions? Was, in fact, was this an interactive process, or was this a proclamation? Was it a monologue or was it a dialogue?

And Mr. Pratt, if you would provide us that information as well.

And here's the deal. I mean, why am I making -- why am I making a big deal of this? You all are here today because the White House won't respond to us. And I would think, if it was possible for the White House to provide a briefing to your executives on April 17, that same person could be made available to this committee and be prepared to answer our questions.

I -- I don't see what is so difficult about that. If the news is as great as everyone has said it is this morning, I -- I -- I think that they would welcome the opportunity to come to our committee and give us the information that we're asking for.

Look. One of the questions that I raised in the opening statement, and I do want your answers on this because it is important, this 90-day grace period and the coverage that can't be canceled during that 90-day grace period because of nonpayment. Is there any way for any of your individual companies to keep up with that information on a rolling basis and keep your providers informed as to the status of a person's payment or nonpayment of their premium?

Start with you, Mr. Coyne, and let's just work down the table.

COYNE: We're working with blue plans to inform providers of the enrollees' status, as you indicated.

BURGESS: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: Yes. We do have a unique identifier for our exchange membership on the I.D. card, and we do provide updates on the members' payment status in our physician information centers. So when the physician offices call or the provider calls, they understand what the payment status is of the member.

BURGESS: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: Our doctors in our hospitals that are servicing our customers have the ability to call or check online the status of the individual's payment, grace period situation.

BURGESS: Mr. Rodgers, would that even pertain to you?

RODGERS: Yes. Similarly, we have electronic means as well as telephone service as well, providers of various types of verified coverage.

BURGESS: And Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: Yes. We provide the same service.

BURGESS: And what I would ask of each of you is will you make available to the committee the type of information and how it is transferred to your providers, your doctors and hospitals, when they call for that information? And then, Mr. Chairman, further, I'd like to ask unanimous consent. The secretary was here in December, the Secretary of Health and Human Services. After that hearing, I submitted a letter to the secretary with several questions that I wanted answered. They have not been answered to date. I am going to ask those same questions of our insurance representatives today. I'm going to ask those in writing, and I would appreciate your response to those questions that the secretary was unwilling to answer.

BLACKBURN: Reserving the right to object.

I would just point out that the secretary was here in front of this committee testifying three times last year, and we -- if there's questions she has not answered, we certainly will be happy to work with the majority and get those questions answered.

MURPHY: Well, we -- members do have the right to...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: ... reservations.

MURPHY: ... submit questions for...

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: And I will be submitting those questions in writing for our panel.

MURPHY: OK.

BURGESS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

MURPHY: Mr. Green, you're now recognized for five minutes.

GREEN: Thank you, Chairman Murphy, and Ranking Member DeGette, for having this hearing today in our witnesses for the testimony.

Our district in Texas is a very urban district in Houston and has one of the highest rates of uninsured people who don't receive insurance through their employer in the country. One of the other talking points that my republican colleagues have seized upon last year, especially when the healthcare.gov was encountering problems early in the enrollment period was the idea that fewer people would have health insurance following the implementation of the Affordable Care Act than did beforehand.

Now I know that all our representatives here today see that the information and how many people that were enrolled and their total number of customers proprietary and I understand that. But you all also, I would hope, familiar with the general insurance landscape and how it's changed under the Affordable Care Act. Earlier this week, a Gallup poll released a survey examining the total number of Americans that have insurance. Mr. Pratt, are you familiar with that survey?

PRATT: Generally, yes. GREEN: The Gallup poll conducted interviews with 14,000 American adults. Gallup found that the number of adults without insurance had dropped to its lowest level since the beginning of 2008. A drop of this magnitude correlates to more than 11 million people gaining coverage. Are you familiar enough with the poll to -- to say that that sounds like a reasonable amount?

PRATT: Congressman, I think that's what they reported. I'm not in position to say whether that's a reasonable amount or not.

GREEN: OK. OK.

Anyone else on the panel want to talk about that Gallup poll? Because, you know, again, these are -- there are what we're seeing. And since the enrollment period end. Rand and Urban Institute released similar reports in March and April. Are any of you familiar with these reports?

PRATT: I'm not...

MATHIS: Very generally.

PRATT: ... I'm not familiar with the reports.

GREEN: OK. Well, in early April, Rand Corporation released results of their poll, which found overall number of Americans with insurance had grown to 9.3 million as of mid-March. Even before the late enrollment date surge. The Urban Institute also released a report in the past month suggesting that millions more people have coverage than before the ACA was implemented.

My question of any of our witnesses, would you agree that the findings of these, whether it be Rand, Gallup or the Urban Institute, are consistent with millions of Americans signing up for health insurance? Did y'all experience that with your companies? During the signup that they selected your company as part of the, if you were having to be part of the exchange, both national or the state exchanges?

MATHIS: Congressman, we do not have, at WellPoint, we do not have enough information at this point to know how many uninsured are actually among the enrollees. Because that data's -- we just don't have access to that data at this point.

GREEN: OK. Well, generally, the ACA has led to a huge increase in coverage. Even without the polls, we've seen some of the numbers. And is that, can you verify that, with your companies? Whether it be WellPoint, Blue Cross? Have you seen that increase in the number of people who've signed up with your companies since the deadline?

RODGERS: Speaking for Healthcare Service Corporation, I've provided in my written testimony as well as in my opening comments, the number of people that we signed up on and off exchange during the open enrollment period. I can't tell you today how many of those came from the ranks of the uninsured, or from our competitors or either from a prior policy with one of our five Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans, but we're certainly happy to have the numbers up.

GREEN: OK. Well, and we understand the -- there were people who were using the -- the websites and the national exchange to shop. And I had some companies who said, "I'm a small business. I -- I encourage--" In fact, I have a (inaudible) in my area, he said, "We have actually helped our employees sign up individually," because, you know, you have 10 employees, they -- they weren't required, but they actually used it, so -- and I know that's an analogy, but I've heard that from a lot of my employers.

Now, I know my republican colleagues with mid-data from these polls, that anything that comes through the administration of the overall signup. In March, Speaker Boehner said that there were less people today with health insurance than there were before this law went into effect.

I think not even basing it on a poll, would you all agree that there are more people in -- have health insurance now, let's say, since May 1? Than we had before the ACA?

RODGERS: I -- I can't speak to numbers on that enrollment.

GREEN: OK.

I don't know how my colleagues continue to make unfounded claims in the face of the clear evidence that Affordable Care Act's providing millions of Americas with, Americans with healthcare coverage. It makes me wonder what -- what possible convince them that millions of Americans have gained coverage under the law. I suspect that ultimately once the information becomes so indisputable it'll -- maybe will change the subject and rather, and concede that clearly more people who have health insurance as a result the ACA.

And having serving many years in Congress and even before that, in the state legislature in Texas, no law of Congress ever passes is perfect. That's not how our forefathers created the system. So we do need to go back like our ranking member said, and see what we can do to fix the ACA. And I appreciate y'all's efforts to help us do that once we get to that point. And I'll yield back my time.

MURPHY: Gentleman yields back. Now recognize Mr. Griffith of Virginia for five minutes.

GRIFFITH: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you all for being here. Miss Blackburn asked you earlier for a show of hands. I'm going to do the same. If your company anticipates a reduction for the average family that you insure of $2500 or more, would you raise your hand? If your company anticipates an -- a reduction in premium of $2,000 per average family, for your subscribers, raise your hand. Same for $1500. All right. I appreciate that.

When will your companies submit their rates to the administration for 2015? Do you all have a date that you're going to do that by? Please start... PRATT: Believe the...

GRIFFITH: Yes.

PRATT: ... rates are due toward the end of June. I believe it's June 27. I think the -- some of the states are a little bit ahead of that.

GRIFFITH: All right. And do you know when those will become public?

PRATT: Depending on the market, sir, that will vary. Depending on the states.

GRIFFITH: All right. And when you submit those to the administration, will you commit today to submitting those rates to us as well?

RODGERS: I'm not involved in the rate submission process, but to the extent that's possible, I'll need to talk to with our company representatives about that.

GRIFFITH: Well, certainly can't see how it'd be illegal to share information with United States Congress but...

RODGERS: Didn't say illegal.

GRIFFITH: ... if possible, you will do it, Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: I need to confirm with our actuaries who are involved in the rate filing process, because I'm not.

PRATT: We're -- we're happy to work with this committee as -- as long as the rates remain proprietary until they do become public and -- and all of our competitors see it.

GRIFFITH: All right. That's certainly fair. Any others? Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: I'd have to take that under advisement about how we share rates.

GRIFFITH: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: I'd just say the rates are very competitively sensitive, for obvious reasons, so we want to make sure that it's a a level playing field at the time the rates are disclosed.

GRIFFITH: Have either you or anyone in your organizations, and again, it's for all of you all, engaged in discussions with the administration already about the 2015 rates?

(UNKNOWN): Not that I'm aware of.

(UNKNOWN): No. Not to my knowledge. GRIFFITH: No -- everyone is silent. Does that mean there have been none? Has anybody had any discussions with the administration about rates for 2015?

(UNKNOWN): None that I'm aware of.

GRIFFITH: OK.

(UNKNOWN): No, no.

GRIFFITH: All right. Appreciate that. Thank you very much.

Mr. Pratt, the ACA includes a tax credit for small businesses to purchase health insurance coverage for employees. The law also levies a tax on health insurance purchase by small businesses. On the one hand, we give employers a tax credit to make health insurance more affordable, and then we turn around with the other hand and we tax those policies. Does that not seem as an inherent conflict in policy to you?

PRATT: Congressman, we've expressed significant concerns with the new tax on small businesses and individuals that total some hundred billion dollars that will largely be passed on to them in the form of higher premiums.

GRIFFITH: And -- and what we're trying to do, of course, is to see if we can't keep premiums down and -- and the ACA, Obamacare, has failed to meet its promise of a $2500 reduction for the average family. That's pretty straightforward, isn't it?

PRATT: Congressman, we -- we do believe that the health insurance tax runs counter to the goal of providing more affordable coverage.

GRIFFITH: And as a part of this, we're actually taxing government itself. We've got federal programs, including Medicare Advantage, Medicaid, managed care. Federal government is in fact taxing itself with the tax that you spoke of earlier through its subsidization of Medicare and in part Medicaid, and then state governments are also having to pay the tax. Do you have any idea how much that tax is on the American people? You said a hundred billion in increase, but how much for the federal and state governments?

PRATT: Congressman, I don't have that information handy, but we did commission a study by Oliver Wyman that does break out that information in more detail, including on a state-by-state basis. And we'd be happy to make that available.

GRIFFITH: All right. I appreciate that, if you would. Also, in your testimony, you write that insurers have many duplicate enrollments because of the problems with Healthcare.gov, and I can tell you that we had that in both -- I've heard it from constituents and in our family. Apparently we didn't push the right button the first time around. Say "we." My wife did it all. Don't want to take on any assumptions that it was us doing it. It was my wife working over the computer for hours and hours. But actually submitted several different applications. Ended up with one.

How widespread is that problem for citizens out there, and is that part of the confusion between whether or not people have paid their premiums or not?

PRATT: Congressman, the challenge you referred to, I think, was presented as a result of the -- the problems with the website and the technology and anecdotally we have heard from our members about a number of duplicate enrollments. Don't have an order of magnitude on that other than to know that it has been a -- a problem, and an issue.

GRIFFITH: All right. I appreciate that. Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

MURPHY: Gentleman yields back. Now recognize Miss Schakowsky for five minutes.

SCHAKOWSKY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. This morning, the democratic committee staff released a memorandum on the amazing number of distortions and false claims that republicans have made about the Affordable Care Act. It's a deplorable record. Virtually every major prediction or claim made by the republicans about the ACA since 2009, turned out to be wrong.

Today we have the benefit of hearing from some of the companies that are actually working on the Affordable Care Act in the real world. These companies were not the biggest supporters of the law. They still oppose many provisions. But they do not live in the Republican echo chamber. They live in the real world, and I hope they can provide some clarity on a few questions.

The first question I have for all of you is whether the ACA is a government takeover of healthcare. Republicans have made that claim I don't know how many times. By one count the phrase appeared on Speaker Boehner's website 90 different places. It's mentioned on the RNC, Republican National Committee website, 200 times. Days before Affordable Care Act's passage in 2010, then-House Minority Leader John Boehner's office wrote that, quote, "Democrats have opted for a government takeover of healthcare."

So Mr. Wingle, the ACA is now in effect. Has the government nationalized Aetna, or is it still a for-profit corporation?

WINGLE: We are a publicly traded, for-profit corporation.

SCHAKOWSKY: And Mr. Evanko, what about you? Has Cigna been taken over by the federal government?

EVANKO: No. We're a for-profit organization.

SCHAKOWSKY: Mr. Rodgers, Mr. Mathias (sic), have your companies been nationalized, or are they still nonprofits?

RODGERS: We're a not-for-profit mutual legal reserve company.

MATHIS: We're actually a for-profit organization. SCHAKOWSKY: Oh, you're for-profit. Sorry.

Mr. Pratt, you work for the trade group that represents the private insurance industry. Is there still a private insurance industry, or has the industry been destroyed or taken over by the government as republicans predicted?

PRATT: There is still a private industry, and we represent many of those companies.

SCHAKOWSKY: Thank you. Republicans also questioned whether the private health insurance -- whether private health insurance would even exist in 2014. In 2010, Senator Coburn said, quote, "There will be no insurance industry left in three years." And that, quote, "private health insurance will be dead in three years."

I should note that nearly four years have passed since that statement was made. Mr. Pratt, is the private industry, health industry, dead?

PRATT: Representative, no.

SCHAKOWSKY: Does anybody else on the panel believe the private industry has disappeared? Private insurance industry? Thank you.

Republicans have also claimed that Americans will no longer be able to see their doctors because of the ACA. Mr. Wingle, do your, does your company healthcare plan, do the plans cover physician care?

WINGLE: They do.

SCHAKOWSKY: And Mr. Evanko, what about you? Does Cigna have doctors in its healthcare plans?

EVANKO: Yes, we do.

SCHAKOWSKY: Mr. Rodgers, what about HCSC? Do you include doctors in your networks?

RODGERS: Certainly.

SCHAKOWSKY: And Mr. Mathias (sic), what about WellPoint?

MATHIS: Yes. We cover physician services.

SCHAKOWSKY: Thank you. Thank you very much.

Republicans have claimed that nobody would sign up for coverage. They've claimed that huge numbers have not paid for coverage. Eight million people have signed up for coverage on the exchanges. Millions more have coverage outside the exchanges, and each of the insurance companies here today have testified that people have signed up in droves and upwards of 80 or 90 percent have paid their premiums.

Mr. Chairman, I don't know if there will ever come a day when republicans will admit their criticisms of the ACA have been unfounded. I think we may have reached a turning point last week when you released your misleading report on the Affordable Care Act enrollment. I think the American public finally realized that republicans have absolutely no credibility on this issue. You cannot be this wrong this many times and still expect to be taken seriously.

When commentator Ezra Klein even gave the republican behavior a name, Obamacare Derangement Syndrome. He defined it as, and I quote, "the acute inability to see Obamacare as anything but a catastrophic failure that the American people will soon reject. For those suffering from ODS, all bad Obamacare news is good news, and all good Obamacare news is sin. In this world, delays of minor provisions in the law prove that the entire structure is collapsing, while surges of millions of people enrolling in insurance don't prove anything at all."

Mr. Chairman, perhaps we can ask our panel of insurers if their policies cover Obamacare Derangement Syndrome. But really, that's rhetorical, and I yield back. Thank you.

MURPHY: But it would be important to know if that's a preexisting condition, and I think it's not covered (inaudible).

SCHAKOWSKY: It would be covered now. Good news, Mr. Chairman.

(LAUGHTER)

MURPHY: Depends what the death panel says, I think, (inaudible).

Mr. Olson's now recognized for five minutes.

OLSON: I thank the Chair. And welcome to our witnesses. I wish you weren't here. But you are here. You're here because the administration would not give us the information we need to educate our constituents about Obamacare. And the rollout of Healthcare.gov.

I want to talk about, all of you, question about the back end. And the money supposed to be getting from the exchange of the information. In your experiences, is it working? Mr. Pratt, the back end working? You getting what you need? From Healthcare.gov?

PRATT: Representative, throughout the open enrollment period, we worked very closely to develop work-arounds, manual processes and other things that were necessary to make the system work better. It's my understanding that while the back-end problems have improved, some remain.

OLSON: Workarounds. You guys stepped up to plate to work around the disaster of the healthcare exchange rollout. Is that what you're trying to say? I mean, you guys took upon yourself, instead of depending on (inaudible). They gathered information. You're dependent upon them. And it's sort of trickling out and just coming slowly, slowly, slowly.

Not what you need? Is that what you're saying? You guys stepped around to make that happen?
PRATT: Representative, I think what I would say is that we kept the interests of our members squarely in mind in terms of minimizing disruption for them, and our members did what was necessary to make sure that it was as smooth as it possibly could be.

OLSON: Mr. Coyne?

COYNE: I would agree with Mr. Pratt. There are still back-end issued to be worked through, but that we are working with CMS on those. CMS has called a meeting of health insurers in the federal marketplace on May 20, to consider some of those back-end issues and try and find solutions to them.

OLSON: I hope you keep up abroad what they, that meeting, puts out, puts forth. Give us that information. Because we're not getting it from the Obama administration. Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: We've worked closely to share our concerns about technical needs and help work with the industry, our trade, through our trade association, with colleagues, to recommend and -- recommend prioritization on fixes for back-end issues, whether they're data cleanup issues or other issues related to the back end of the exchange.

OLSON: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: There are certainly more manual processes than we anticipated prior to the exchanges launching. I'd say there have been improvements in some areas. The one back-end issue that we're move focused on is the APTC payments coming from CMS to our -- our -- us as a carrier. That's a manual process today. We have been getting the payments we've been requesting though, as it relates to APTC.

OLSON: Manual process. Twenty-first Century manual process. Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: We're continuing to work with the enrollment process to make sure that any of the members that have selected one of our five Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans get the information they need from us and ultimately the care they need.

OLSON: Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: Yes. We're -- we've seen significant improvement, but we still have a number of opportunities for improvement as we move through the remainder of this year.

OLSON: And one final question for all the panelists. Is the website fixed? Mr. Pratt? If it's not fixed, when will it be fixed?

PRATT: Representative, I don't work in the operations area. I think if the back-end issues are considered part of the website, I would suggest...

OLSON: They are.

PRATT: ... that there are -- there are still issues outstanding that we're working on.

OLSON: Not fixed. Mr. Coyne?

COYNE: There are still issues on the back end...

(CROSSTALK)

OLSON: Another one not fixed. Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: There's still work to be done.

OLSON: Not fixed. Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: I can't comment on the end-to-end process. I can only comment on the component when CMS sends us enrollment transactions. And there's still work to do before that's 100 percent.

OLSON: Not fixed. Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Yes. We're still working with the files that we get, and I think there could be some improvement.

OLSON: Still not fixed. Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: Yes. To echo my colleagues' statements, we still have opportunities for improvement.

OLSON: Six for six. All not fixed. Mr. Chairman, I yield back. That's my time.

CHAIRMAN: Now recognize Mr. Tonko for five minutes.

TONKO: Thank you, Mr. Chair. So much of the debate we have with our Republican colleagues about the Affordable Care Act comes down to one simple question. Is it a good thing for Americans to have access to quality health insurance?

You would think this is a simple question. Every Republican member of the committee has health insurance. I bet that every pundit who makes a living attacking the ACA has health insurance. They all make certain their children have health insurance. I bet they wouldn't dream of going without it for an extended period of time.

Two big reasons these people make sure they have coverage is that it can help them stay healthy, and it can prevent catastrophic medical bills that can lead to financial ruin. But this week we got clear evidence from Massachusetts that health insurance actually saves lives. Researchers at the Harvard School of Public Health looked at mortality rates in Massachusetts and in surrounding states.

My question, Mr. Pratt, is that in 2006, Massachusetts passed major health reform legislation. Is that not correct?

PRATT: Yes, that's correct.

TONKO: And did that coverage expansion bear some significant similarities to the Affordable Care Act, including an individual mandate, expanded Medicaid coverage, and insurance exchanges?

PRATT: Generally, I would say that's fair to say.

TONKO: Thank you. The Harvard researchers found that following healthcare reform in Massachusetts, mortality rates dropped significantly compared to surrounding states. The death rate from treatable illnesses, like cancer and heart disease, declined even faster. These findings are truly remarkable, nearly a 5 percent drop in mortality from preventable illnesses. They found that for every 830 individuals who gained coverage, one life was saved.

Extrapolating that onto the national scene, if the trend holds, it means that ACA will save tens of thousands of lives. I'm not going to ask the witnesses to comment on the specifics of that study. But these witnesses know the value that health insurance provides.

Mr. MATHIS, do you have any doubt that your health insurance plans cover lifesaving treatments?

MATHIS: No, they do, sir.

TONKO: Mr. Evanko, what about you? Do you help members access lifesaving treatments?

EVANKO: Absolutely.

TONKO: Thank you. And, Mr. RODGERS, Mr. Wingle, what about your plans?

RODGERS: At the healthcare company, we are proud of providing consumers with high-quality plans, competitively priced. We're very proud of that.

WINGLE: Yes, sir. I agree.

TONKO: Thank you for your affirmative answers. Thank you. I think Republicans are really outside of the mainstream when they try to argue that Americans aren't better off if they have health insurance coverage. Their tireless efforts to discourage people from getting covered are truly shameful. Even more shameful is the refusal of Republican governors and some legislatures to expand the Medicaid program. Doing that would provide millions of Americans with healthcare coverage. And the Harvard study indicates that doing so would save thousands of lives. So we thank you for your affirmative answers.

(UNKNOWN): (Inaudible) back now, recognize Mr. Gardner for five minutes.

GARDNER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you to the witnesses for being here today, and your time. Last year, the president apologized for his broken promise -- if you like your plan, you can keep your plan -- after millions of Americans received plan cancellations. I'd like each insurer to reply in turn, how many plans did you cancel or discontinue last year because of Obamacare?

Mr. Coyne?

COYNE: We don't have that information at the association. Individual health plans have that information.

GARDNER: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: We can provide that information to the committee.

GARDNER: Could you submit that for the record and by state what the total, for all of you?

Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: Sure. It's...

GARDNER: Do you have the number off the top of your head right now?

EVANKO: I can give you approximations...

(CROSSTALK)

GARDNER: Sure. That'd be great.

EVANKO: We had approximately 2,000 customers -- individual customers in South Carolina and Connecticut.

GARDNER: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: Again, we want to get you the -- the firm data.

GARDNER: Okay. Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: I don't have that data with me. I think we provided it to other congressional committees, so we certainly can...

GARDNER: But that's not a number that you keep on the top of your head?

RODGERS: Not at all.

GARDNER: Okay. Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: I don't have the number of products off the top of my head, but we'd be happy to provide that...

GARDNER: If you could submit for the record, by state and with the total, I would appreciate it. Then -- hey, does your organization know how many planned cancellations there were nationwide last year or -- or for your members?

MATHIS: Congressman, we would not have that information.

GARDNER: You're -- you don't ask that of your members? They don't provide that to you?

MATHIS: To my knowledge, we do not, no.

GARDNER: And, Mr. Coyne, does your organization know how many member plans were cancelled? You don't?

COYNE: We haven't asked for that information either.

GARDNER: In order to avoid these cancellations, some insurers offered early renewal plans, so they could continue into 2014. If each of the insurers could reply in turn, how many plans did you offer early renewals, too, last year that would have been otherwise cancelled?

Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: We -- we offered early renewals to all of our customers in all 14 states. That was allowable. So California did not allow us to offer early renewal. But in the majority of every other market, we offered it to every customer.

GARDNER: Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: We offered early renewals in four of our five states, the Montana Plan became part of our larger...

GARDNER: And how many -- how many were the -- were those offers? How many offers were there?

RODGERS: I don't have the number with me, but they're significant numbers, yes. And...

GARDNER: Did you provide -- all of you provide those for the record and by state, breaking it down, please?

Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: Yes. We offered early renewals to about 235,000 customers in all states, except for Connecticut and South Carolina, as I testified earlier.

GARDNER: Okay.

And, Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: We offered early renewals as consistent with state laws and regulations.

GARDNER: Okay. Last year, president apologized -- President Obama apologized for these cancelled plans and offered a one-year delay of enforcing the Obamacare requirements that led to the cancellations. This delay has since been extended.

I'd like each insurer to answer, how many plans do you currently offer that do not meet the law's requirements but you are able to continue offering because of this delay?

Mr. Mathis? MATHIS: I would have to get you that number, sir. I don't know it off the top of my head.

GARDNER: Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Yeah. I don't know the number.

GARDNER: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: I don't know the exact figure either.

GARDNER: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: I don't have the hard numbers on the pre-ACA plans.

GARDNER: To AHIP, do you know how many plans your member organizations currently offer under this delay?

PRATT: Could you please repeat that question (inaudible)?

GARDNER: The question is the one-year delay of enforcing Obamacare requirements that led to the cancellation, this delay has been extended. How many plans do you currently offer that do not meet the law's requirements but you're able to continue offering because of this delay?

(CROSSTALK)

PRATT: We don't have that information.

GARDNER: ...number.

Mr. Coyne?

COYNE: The only information we have has been informally reported to us. And it contains all non-ACA compliant plans across the Blue system, and that number is 3.2 million.

GARDNER: Mr. Mathis, what happens when those plans -- when the time runs out, when the delay expires?

MATHIS: So it -- depending on how the state handles it, with the extension, in theory, a customer could sign up for two more years.

GARDNER: What happens after that time expires, cancelled?

MATHIS: Then they would be new to an ACA product.

GARDNER: So that plan would be cancelled?

MATHIS: Yes, sir.

GARDNER: Mr. Rodgers, would that plan be cancelled at the end of the time period?

RODGERS: Mr. Matheson's (sic) characterization was correct. I believe...

GARDNER: So, yes, that's a cancellation after the time expires.

Mr. Evanko, would those plans be cancelled after the time expired?

EVANKO: Based on the current guidance, yes.

GARDNER: Mr. Wingle, would those plans be cancelled after the time expires?

WINGLE: Where -- where feasible, we would offer the member an ACA-compliant alternative.

GARDNER: Could you submit the total numbers for all those plans that would be cancelled when the time expires? Break it down by state, please. Thank you.

And one of the excuses that we've heard from the -- the supporters of the healthcare bill is that the law didn't do this, didn't cause the cancellations, that you were the ones who planned the cancellations and planned all of the cancellations. Were the massive cancellation notices sent last year the ones the president apologized for? Were these because of Obamacare or because of you?

Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: The law required us to send out those cancellations.

GARDNER: So Obamacare required the cancellations.

Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: The law required us to, in certain situations...

(CROSSTALK)

GARDNER: So Obamacare caused and required the cancellation.

Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: We had such a small fraction of our book of business that was not offered early renewals, but that was...

GARDNER: So -- but Obamacare required the 2,000 cancellations that you said?

EVANKO: In the two states where we did not offer early renewals.

GARDNER: Mr. Wingle, did Obamacare cause the cancellations?

WINGLE: Plans that weren't compliant with the benefit requirements of the law were cancelled.

GARDNER: So that's a yes?

WINGLE: That is a yes.

GARDNER: In attempting to pass this law, the president said repeatedly, "If you like your plan, you can keep it." Did that turn out to be true for all of your customers?

Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: No. That was not true for 100 percent of our customers.

GARDNER: Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Not for 100 percent.

GARDNER: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: For over 99 percent of our customers, that was the case.

GARDNER: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: Not in all cases, no.

(CROSSTALK)

GARDNER: ...your time, and I yield back.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you. Now, recognize Miss Castor for five minutes.

CASTOR: Well, thank you very much. And good morning. And thank you, Mr. Chairman, for calling this hearing to discuss the strong enrollment numbers of the Affordable Care Act.

When the enrollment numbers were released last week, coming from the state of Florida, we were floored. About 1 million Floridians signed up under the Affordable Care Act. This far exceeded our expectations. We thought 600,000, 700,000, but to get to about a million signed up, that doesn't include the about 300,000 children that signed up under children's health insurance, or our disabled neighbors, or children under Medicaid.

And then I learned from our Florida Blue executives Friday, Florida Blue's the market leader in Florida that -- that million- dollar figure does not include others that signed up for -- with private health insurance companies. So that's -- add on another probably couple hundred thousand. It's really remarkable, and it has far exceeded our expectations.

Now, I really -- you know, I just think about all of my neighbors all across the state that are breathing easier because now they have financial security in their lives that they did not have before. And I want to thank all of our navigators, the insurance brokers, many of the insurance companies that were out providing information, all of our community outreach partners. You have made a fundamental difference in the lives of -- of millions of Floridians. And it's -- it's going to be very meaningful for them and their families. It's also good news for neighbors that have insurance already. Most people across America already have insurance. And if you have insurance, what you want most of all is that you want other people to have insurance because the -- the cost of these high premium increases and rates -- rate increases over time were largely caused by this huge uninsured population. And those costs, when they show up at the hospital for healthcare, they have to be paid somewhere. So that's what we're hoping then.

And we've heard time and time again of some -- the scare tactics here. And we will -- we'll see what happens with premium increases. But do we want to go back to the double-digit consistent premium increases of the past? I don't think so. So this is a way that hopefully, over time, we will be able to stabilize the marketplace.

And I think my -- my colleague Congressman Tonko was right. I think my Republican friends now are in danger of sounding like they are opposed to people taking personal responsibility and having health insurance. People need to have health insurance to maintain their quality of life, to -- to make sure they don't go bankrupt. And I would hope that my Republican friends could now turn the page and we could get to work on many of the complicated issues with health policy in America.

Now, one of the -- my Republican colleagues, if they were to tax on healthcare reform, is that it will cause people to lose their doctors. Now, you have to say, okay, even in Florida, where you have over a million people now that now have health insurance, they're going to be able to see a doctor, 8 million nationwide. But this is especially bizarre coming from Republicans because they have long opposed any policy proposals to broaden networks. They have fought efforts to increase reimbursement for primary care providers who serve Medicare and Medicaid patients.

What has been lost in this debate is the fact that the ACA sets important new network adequacy standards that guarantee access to key essential community providers. It ensures that no consumer will ever see a huge out-of-network bill if they're taken to an emergency room. And it gives consumers strong appeal rights. It's a huge step forward in patient access.

Mr. Pratt, can you give us some context here? Providers and insurance regularly negotiate rates and determine who will -- inside of a network. Isn't that correct?

PRATT: Representative, yes, that's correct.

CASTOR: And if insurers had to include every provider in their network, wouldn't that eliminate their bargaining power and substantially increase premiums?

PRATT: Congresswoman, I think that is generally correct. I wouldn't characterize the amount of the increase. But it is a very important aspect of keeping premiums affordable.

CASTOR: Okay. Can these high-value networks improve care coordination and move us towards a system where we pay for quality rather than quantity in our healthcare system?

PRATT: Absolutely. Our members are working very hard toward that end.

CASTOR: See, I think this network adequacy is a -- in the marketplace is an important issue. We need to make sure that consumers have access to providers in their area and that they have enough choices to get the care they need when they need it. Republicans should not attack the ACA for letting the private market work.

And remember personal responsibility is fundamental. It's a fundamental tenet of the Affordable Care Act. And it's often times the customers' responsibility to review all of the choices they have, whether it's Bronze, Silver, Gold, Platinum and the networks contained therein and make their own choice. So the law sets key new standards and provides important protections but insurers and providers will continue to negotiate to ensure sufficient access at fair prices.

Thank you very much. I yield back.

(UNKNOWN): (Inaudible) yields back. Chair recognizes gentleman from Ohio. Mr. Johnson, five minutes for your questions, please.

JOHNSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Wow. So much to -- to talk about, so little time to -- to talk about it all. Gentlemen, thank you for joining us today. You know, one of the reasons this committee is requested -- has requested this information from you is because the administration has refused repeatedly to provide any data on who is actually paying for the Affordable Care Act.

In fact, one White House spokesman told reporters to ask your industry for this information. Do you -- so here's the question for you. Do you currently provide any information to the administration on who has paid for their plan? If yes, what information do you provide and -- and how is it provided and how often? It -- do -- do you provide any information to the administration?

WINGLE: The only information we provide around -- around payment is related to the invoicing we do with the government to get the premium tax credit.

JOHNSON: And how is it provided and how often?

WINGLE: It's the process we described earlier. It's a -- it's a workaround process because the financial management module is not fully constructed on the FFM (inaudible)...

(CROSSTALK)

JOHNSON: Who do you send it to, Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: Send it to CMS.

JOHNSON: Okay. Well, for -- it's -- it's a little confusing. So the administration will pay your industry a subsidy for potential customers who never even effectuate their enrollment. So if you're not providing the details to the administration on who's paying for the Affordable Care Act, how are they paying you? How are they -- what -- what are they basing their payments to you on?

WINGLE: I'd only make one clarification. We do not submit information for payment from the government for member who are not effectuated, who haven't made their own portion of the binder payment. We do not do that.

JOHNSON: What -- let me -- let me dig a little deeper then. So how do you get paid? How do you get paid? And what is that based on? What information do you provide the government, the administration, that gets you paid?

WINGLE: The -- the process essentially works because we have the enrollment file information. We understand the premium for the plan selected by the consumer on that enrollment file.

JOHNSON: So you're paid based on enrollment, not on actual payment?

WINGLE: Yeah. We understand the member's responsibility on that enrollment, and the difference between the premium rate and the member responsibility tells us what the government is -- and we roll that figure up monthly.

JOHNSON: So if you only submit for effectuated -- it -- I can't even pronounce that word. Doesn't the administration know the pay rate? Don't they know how much these people are -- are -- are paying?

MATHIS: Yes, sir. They -- they've determined the subsidy eligibility as part of the enrollment process. And so a file would come to us. We'd bill for the member responsibility. Upon collection of that member responsibility, then we would -- typically, if the system were working as designed, we would send a file to the government, to the exchange, saying, "Here are the members that have effectuated enrollment, and here's ultimately the payment that is back due to us."

JOHNSON: So do you believe the administration is currently able to report the payment rate or who is fully enrolled? Do you think they have that information, based on what you give them?

MATHIS: So, to date, the payments that are coming back and forth are estimated. So there's not been a direct reconciliation between our company and the exchange on a member by member basis. That's one of the works in progress that we discussed on the backend discussion we had earlier in the day, sir.

JOHNSON: Considering then that the administration is able to report who selects a plan on healthcare.gov, would it be possible for them to gather information on who has actually paid for a plan? Let's start down with Mr. Pratt.

PRATT: Representative, it's my understanding that that capability is not present yet... JOHNSON: Mr. Coyne?

PRATT: ...whether it may be in the future.

JOHNSON: Okay.

COYNE: Yeah. It's -- it's my understanding as well that that capability isn't ready yet.

JOHNSON: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: I don't know what the administration can infer from the data they have. But I know the financial management module itself is not available.

JOHNSON: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: One bit of color I'll add to my colleagues is the submission for APTC is only for those that are APTC eligible. So there's also people that do not qualify for that. That should be in that calculation.

JOHNSON: Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Yes. I think my -- my colleagues are correct in the -- in their statements. And we're still working on the reconciliation process for payment.

JOHNSON: Okay.

Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: I would concur with what was (inaudible).

JOHNSON: Final question. Does the administration know who's paid for their plan?

Mr. Pratt?

PRATT: Congressman, I don't know the answer to that question.

JOHNSON: Mr. Coyne?

COYNE: I don't know either.

WINGLE: I don't know what the administration knows about the enrollment, in terms of who's paid.

EVANKO: I don't know either.

RODGERS: No, sir.

MATHIS: No, sir.

JOHNSON: It's interesting that they sent us to ask you folks. Okay. Mr. Chairman, I yield back. (UNKNOWN): Gentleman yields back his time. Chair recognizes gentleman from Kentucky. Mr. Yarmuth, you have five minutes for your questions, please.

YARMUTH: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. And I'm really glad we had this hearing. That's something I usually don't say very often. But this has been a very illuminating hearing because I think what it's done very clearly is to show what our colleagues on the other side's strategy is, which is to try and hold a hearing in which they can grab a headline that will, in some way, scare the American people about what's -- about the Affordable Care Act rather than providing true information about what's going on.

And, you know, it's -- it's clear from the desperation. Once their initial strategy of trying to deal with this alleged failure to pay premiums -- now they've moved on to try and scare people about what premiums might increase by later, either next year or in the future. So, you know -- I -- and I'm glad you all stressed how important is was that you not give up your competitive position because, obviously, you're all competing in markets.

And, you know, I could turn that strategy around and do the same thing and ask you speculative questions like, will the premium increases that we are likely to see approach the 38 percent that we saw -- we were seeing in 2010 before the Affordable Care Act was passed? And -- and I'll ask you to speculate on that. But I won't do that. And I -- I could ask you about what the rate of cancellations of policies were prior to the -- the Affordable Care Act.

And I could also ask you -- and I think this would be a fair question. I wouldn't expect you to answer. How many of your insurance companies, because of the success of the Affordable Care Act enrollment so far and the -- the beneficial mix of younger people has prompted you to explore doing business in other states, as has been reported in the media? I think that would be a question that I would love to have the answer to.

I know, for instance, in Kentucky, the -- the co-op -- the non- profit Kentucky co-op, which is competing in the exchange, is now getting ready to do business in West Virginia because they don't have a co-op, and they see an opportunity there. And I think the main co- op is planning to do business in (inaudible) Massachusetts co-op in Maine because they see an opportunity there.

So I think all these things are indications that the Affordable Care Act, far from being the train wreck which many have suggested it would become, is actually getting a lot deal of traction as it -- it speeds down the -- the tracks. And just to put it in perspective, in Kentucky, we have -- we have insured, in the period of six months, roughly half of the previously uninsured population of the state. We -- 411,000 people now have coverage in Kentucky under the ACA. Three- quarters of those -- in answer to one of the questions that was asked earlier, three-quarters of those we know previously had no insurance. And 52 percent of all that 411,000 people are under 35.

So we know things are in -- working in Kentucky, and, as Ms. Castor mentioned, things are surprisingly successful in Florida despite an administration there which has done everything it could to sabotage the -- the Affordable Care Act. So, you know, I -- one that we can speculate about and argue about as a level of success, whether it's success or a train wreck, you know, the markets certainly have had something to say about how they view the Affordable Care Act in terms of your businesses.

I look at those share prices of the companies represented here, and one based in my own state -- Humana's based in my district. When the Affordable Care Act was enacted, their stock price was 44. Now it's 110. Aetna's was 33. Now it's 72. United Healthcare was 27. Now it's 75. And Cigna's was 34, and now it's 83, roughly. So the market has made a judgment, I think, about the fact that, at least in terms of your business, the Affordable Care Act has offered a significant financial benefit.

So I think this -- again, this is -- one of the things that's fascinating about this hearing is we know what the Republicans have tried to do, and that's to scare the American people and to use every little indication of a problem that -- to reflect a -- some kind of a doomsday scenario that we are looking at. And, fortunately, the facts on the ground, whether it's the marketplace, whether it's the experience in Kentucky or Florida or California, where literally millions of people -- by one estimate, 20.8 million people -- got coverage under the ACA, or bought coverage because of the ACA in the private markets outside the exchanges, we are doing exactly what we intended it to do.

We know there have been glitches. We know there have been problems. Any undertaking of this magnitude would experience those. But, again, I thank you for your participation, and I thank you for this hearing. And I yield back.

(UNKNOWN): Gentleman from New Mexico is recognized for five minutes, Mr. Lujan, for your questions, please.

LUJAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Mathis, your company CEO said last week that the surge in enrollment in March included a higher percentage of young people than in earlier months. Isn't that correct?

MATHIS: That is correct, sir.

LUJAN: And, Mr. Evanko, your CEO said something similar last week as well. Isn't that correct?

EVANKO: That's correct.

LUJAN: And as a general matter, all else being equal, a higher percentage of young people in the risk pool will help lower premiums. Isn't that correct?

Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: That's a complicated question. It's an important one. But it's a complicated question.

LUJAN: I think that all that we've heard and from all the actuaries is that the answer is yes. We need more young people in. It lowers premiums.

Mr. Pratt, insurance company premiums are market sensitive information that companies are not eager to let their competitors know until the last minute. Isn't that correct?

PRATT: Representative, it is competitively sensitive information. I don't know that I could speak to their particular perspective on that question.

LUJAN: Well, it seems like they'd want to keep it to themselves as long as they're able to so that competitors aren't able to get their hands on it and adjust accordingly. Is that correct? Is that fair?

PRATT: It's fair to say it's competitively sensitive information.

LUJAN: And is it correct that many insurance commissioners around the country have the authority to review rates and that the final rates consumers pay are sometimes lower than the rates that are actually filed?

PRATT: Yes, Representative. Typically speaking, rates are filed with the states, and the states review those rates.

LUJAN: Very good. I -- I used to sit on a regulatory body that the superintendent of insurance was under our jurisdiction, so I appreciate the answer to that because I know what we saw when I was there as well, sir. So I'd certainly agree with that. Is it also true that the ACA contains a series of policies, re-insurance, risk adjustment, and risk corridors to help mitigate potential premium increases?

PRATT: Congressman, one goal of the three Rs program -- the so- called three Rs program is to stabilize premiums in the early years of implementation.

LUJAN: And a final question to the panelists. Before the ACA, wasn't it common for insurance premiums to increase significant year to year, often by double digits? Anyone? Is there anyone that would disagree that premiums increased by more than 50 percent between 2003 and 2010? Hearing none, I guess the answer to that is there's agreement.

The 8 million figure only includes people who have signed up for insurance directly through the federal and state marketplaces that my colleagues are trying to dismiss. But people can also sign up for private ACA-compliant plans outside of the marketplaces. We don't have a lot of conversation about that.

Mr. Pratt, are individuals able to enroll in some of the plans that AHIP represents outside of the federal and state marketplaces? PRATT: That's correct.

LUJAN: The CBO estimates that 5 million people will purchase ACA-compliant plans outside of the marketplace this year. These individuals will obtain the same protections and be a part of the same risk pools in each state as those who enrolled via the marketplaces.

Mr. Rodgers, how many of HSCS's (sic) enrollments have outside been -- have been outside of the marketplace?

RODGERS: As I said in my opening testimony, it was provided in written form to the committee. I believe we had about 230,000 off- exchange applications during the open enrollment period ending April 15.

LUJAN: And about how many applicants have you received overall?

RODGERS: We've received overall about 830,000 applications across our five states.

LUJAN: So that sounds like it's representing about 1.2 million covered lives. So about 28 percent of your enrollees signed up outside of the marketplaces. That's a significant number. And I understand that payment date is not complete. But in the earlier months of this year, what percentage of individuals enrolling in plans outside of the marketplace have paid?

RODGERS: In my written comments to the committee, I shared with you the on-exchange and off-exchange payment rates because there is some difference. Typically, the payment completion rates are a little bit higher off-exchange versus -- versus on-exchange, and you should have that data.

LUJAN: So what -- from what I was able to get from your testimony was that between January and April, 90 to 93 percent, and in May, 63 percent today. And we can verify that in the -- and there's -- that sound accurate, though?

RODGERS: That's correct. That's in my written comments.

LUJAN: Can any of our other witnesses provide us with information on how many off-exchange enrollments they have had to date?

If not, if you -- Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: We have approximately 40,000 off-exchange ACA enrollments. That's about one-third of our total ACA-compliant book.

LUJAN: And what I'd like to do is ask our witnesses if they'd be willing to provide the committee with detailed information on their off-exchange enrollments. Would that be okay with everyone?

RODGERS: Yes.

LUJAN: Very good. I appreciate that. And, you know, later on today, we're going to be having some other hearings in other areas. Despite the demonization and demagoguing of the Affordable Care Act, over 8 million enrollees. Can you imagine what it would have been if Democrats and Republicans would have worked together to fix issues that needed fixing but were able to get more people covered? Who knows where that number would have been.

But later on today, we're going to be having a hearing on taking away someone's Fifth Amendment rights. We have my colleagues that are still refusing to release 39 interview transcripts on an IRS hearing. There is going to be other hearings -- another request on a hearing with Benghazi, even though there's been seven other hearings, 50 repeal attempts on the Affordable Care Act -- think there's a lot of important pressing business that we as the Congress need to get our hands around.

And I'm certainly hopeful that -- in the history and tradition of this committee, with all that I've learned from our senior members, there once upon a time was an effort for us to work together and get along. I certainly hope that those days return. Every time I'm home, that's what we here.

So of all the witnesses that are here today, thank you so much. Chairman, again, for you being here as well and the hearing being brought together today, an important conversation. I hope that we're able to bring more facts into the debate. Thank you very much.

(UNKNOWN): Now his time has expired. The Chair recognizes the ranking members to get -- or follow up.

DEGETTE: Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to follow up on Mr. Lujan's questioning with the off-exchange enrollments because, as we've learned, there have been a number of off-exchange enrollments as -- in addition to the enrollments in the ACA in the -- both in the federal exchange, in the state exchanges.

So I would ask unanimous consent. The committee has made a request of the -- of 160 plans, including plans from this panel here, that they provide information about enrollment figures and premium payments for -- for those plans that are under the Affordable Care Act, the exchanges.

I would ask also if we would ask those same plans for that same information on the off-exchange enrollment, similar to the -- to the data that we got from Blue Cross Blue Shield. Be helpful to know how many off-exchange enrollments we've had from these 160 plans and -- and what the premium payments have been. So I'd ask unanimous consent, that we also ask for that information.

MURPHY: The gentlelady yields back right now. Myself for follow-up. And I would just say, on the off enrollment, I'm one of those members. I actually had both Blue Cross Blue Shield in healthcare.gov on hold. Well, they had me on hold on December 23 and December 24. And it was kind of a race to see who would have a live person answer the phone first. I think, if I recall correctly, Blue Cross won out that day. So I was probably an off-exchange enrollment. So you may count me as that. Just like to ask each of you in follow-up, many of the products you are offering are only affordable because the government subsidizes part of the premium cost. Do you know what percentage of the plans with paid premiums and effectuated enrollment received some form of subsidy from a taxpayer?

Mr. Coyne, I'll start with you, and then we just go down the line.

COYNE: We don't have that information at this point.

MURPHY: Would you provide it for the record?

COYNE: Yes, we'd be happy to when we get it.

MURPHY: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: Our experience probably comports with generally available published information on that. It's -- it's a majority of our membership.

MURPHY: And, again, can I ask you to submit that for the record?

Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: For on-exchange customers, 80 to 85 percent are eligible for APTC.

MURPHY: Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Yes. I believe we submitted that information, if I understood your question, in the two submissions for April. And with the May 20th submission, we'll provide something similar.

(UNKNOWN): As did we.

MURPHY: Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: Yes. As you know, that number is a moving target. But it is around 79 percent for us.

MURPHY: And would you do your best to -- to give us an accurate representation for the -- for the record. What about a situation where an individual enrolls but then cancels their plan? Are you only paid the subsidy monthly? Or would you be responsible for turning a portion of the subsidy throughout the year?

Mr. Coyne, we'll start with you.

COYNE: No. We don't have that information.

MURPHY: And will you submit that for the record?

COYNE: Yes.

MURPHY: Please try to find that for us. Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: Could you repeat the question, please, Mr. Chairman?

MURPHY: A situation where an individual enrolls but then cancels their plan, are you only paid the subsidy monthly? Or would you be responsible for returning the portion throughout the year?

WINGLE: Returning the portion of premium paid or...

MURPHY: The -- the Advanced Premium Tax Credit.

WINGLE: Oh, the subsidy. The subsidy, you know, under the three-month grace period rules, we retain until cancellation.

MURPHY: So you would not be required to return that?

WINGLE: No, not until members cancel.

MURPHY: If the member just simply doesn't pay -- they make their first payment, made their second payment, and then they stop. At the end of that three-month grace period, do you have to return the money for those months where they didn't -- the patient didn't pay?

WINGLE: In compliance with the three-month grace period rules, we retain any premium tax credit received during the period to cover -- help us cover or to -- any claims experience we had during the time the member (inaudible).

MURPHY: So you retain the Advanced Premium Tax...

(CROSSTALK)

WINGLE: According with the design of the rules, yes.

MURPHY: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: Well, at -- at the end of the 90-day grace period, if the individual has not paid any more premiums, then we owe that money back to CMS, and we credit that in the next month's reconciliation process.

MURPHY: Interesting.

Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Yeah. I'm not familiar with that particular aspect of the grace period payments in terms of -- of the return or not. But in my -- I believe that we're only entitled to the money that's -- for the -- the time the policy's in effect.

MURPHY: And Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: That's my understanding as well, sir.

MURPHY: Mr. Coyne, do you know -- do you know how much your company has been paid in Advanced Premium Tax Credits?

COYNE: Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association does not actually sponsor any of the products that are on the exchanges. Our member plans do. So we wouldn't be paid premiums or APTC.

MURPHY: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: We received four payments so far for the months of January through April. And it's in the range of 30 to $40 million.

MURPHY: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: We obviously have that data. We can supply the committee with that data.

MURPHY: And that should be -- free to submit that for the record.

Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: We received some payments. I don't know the value of the payments to date.

MURPHY: And will you find that information and submit it for the record, please?

RODGERS: Certainly.

MURPHY: And Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: Yes. I don't have that number ready today, but we'd be happy to get it for you.

MURPHY: The metal plans, you're all familiar with them? Keep hearing about a Copper Plan that's going to be offered. Are any of you familiar with that? Are you -- be offering Copper Plans?

Mr. Coyne?

COYNE: I'm not familiar with that at this point.

MURPHY: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: Under the current rules for essential health benefits and the rules for qualified health plans, we're not currently authorized to offer anything at the so-called Copper level. Our plan benefits start at Bronze, unless somebody qualifies for catastrophic care. And that's of the lowest actuarial value we're allowed to offer presently.

MURPHY: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: In the event that Copper Plans were introduced as something that's allowed, we would certainly consider it. Cigna believes in choice as one of our core principles for our customers.

MURPHY: Thank you.

Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Currently, we're not approved to offer the Copper Plans. That's certainly something that we believe that members need more cost-effective programs. So if those are offered, I expect that we would...

(CROSSTALK)

MURPHY: Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: My comments will be similar to my colleagues, sir.

MURPHY: Let me just ask each of you, what is your payment rate for products in the large group market?

Starting with you, Mr. Coyne, what are your payments for products in large group market?

COYNE: Individual group plans have that information rather than the association.

MURPHY: See.

Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: I carry no responsibility for large group. I'd have to get back to you on that.

MURPHY: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: I'm not familiar with the large group payment rates either. I'm sorry.

MURPHY: Your company, though, is -- I mean, you're -- you're in the large group market.

EVANKO: We are, sir, yes.

MURPHY: Will you get that information for us? Thank you.

Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Yeah. I don't have that information with me.

MURPHY: But you will provide it for the committee?

RODGERS: Certainly.

MURPHY: And Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: I'm not sure I understand the question. Could you clarify it for me, please?

MURPHY: Well, the question was, what are your payment rates for products in the large group market?

MATHIS: So is that what our average premium is or...

MURPHY: Your -- how many people pay.

MATHIS: I'm sorry, sir. I'm still not following the question.

MURPHY: Well, what we've generally been talking about today is how many people -- what percentage of people have -- have paid. So can -- following along with that theme...

(CROSSTALK)

MATHIS: I'm sorry. I was a little slow on the uptake there. Typically, we would experience somewhere around a 98 to 97 percent premium payment in -- in the group -- in the large group market.

MURPHY: Very well. Thank you all for your attendance today. Ask (inaudible) consent that members' written opening statements be introduced into the record. Without objection, the documents will be entered into the record. In conclusion, I'd like to thank all the witnesses and the members that participated in today's hearing. I'd like to thank everyone who stuck with us to the end, although that would be the witnesses. I remind members they have 10 business days to submit questions for the record. And I ask the witnesses to all agree to respond promptly to the questions. The committee now stands in adjournment.

TEXT:

MURPHY: Good morning. I now convene this hearing to examine the implementation of the Affordable Care Act and enrollment of the state in federal exchanges here in the oversight and investigation committee--for the committee on energy and commerce. This sub- committee has a long history of trying to get straight answers from the administration on the status of the Affordable Care Act.

Two weeks before the launch of Healthcare.gov; the administration official responsible for the implementation of the ACA Exchanges told this committee that the website would be ready; consumers would be able to go online, shop for select plan and then enroll in coverage. When the federal exchange opened on October 1, consumers instead found a crashing website. The administration excuse for why the website didn't work: volume.

Through this committee's investigation we learned that the administration spent over half a billion dollars on a website that they had been warned for several months, would not be ready and would not work. The fact that the administration officials did not disclose when questioned by this committee during oversight hearings through 2013. Just after the failed launch we asked the administration on October 8th to provide enrollment data for the first week of healthcare.gov; debacle. The administration ignored us. Why? It wasn't because the data didn't exist; it was because the news wasn't good.

When Secretary Sebelius testified before the full energy and commerce committee on October 30th of last year; was asked about enrollment, she stated that she could not provide any data because the administration did not "have any reliable data around enrollment." The very next day, it was reported that there were only six successful enrollments on October 1st. We tried again during a hearing in January before the sub-committee when we asked the head of the office running the exchanges if the administration collected any data on who has paid their health coverage.

This administration official told us that they did not collect this information, "but we will be" as soon as it was finished building the website. While the administration refused to provide straightforward answers to our questions on enrollment, it continues to tout enrollment figures that included individuals who had merely selected a plan online.

When pressed by reporters for information on the number of enrollee's who had paid their premiums, a White House spokesman said that questions about payment "can best be directed to those private insurance companies that are collecting those payments." After months of an administration that refused to be transparent about enrollment, that's what we did. We did exactly what the administration suggested we do. On March 13th we sent a request to each insurance company in the Federal Marketplace and asked them to submit basic information: who selected a plan and who paid for it.

The data submitted by the Insurer's paints an uneven picture about the status of enrollment and payment through April 15th. As of that date, just 2/3 of enrollee's through the federally facilitated marketplace paid their first month premium. Some states are doing better than others. My home state of Pennsylvania, for example, has an 81 percent payment rate. Texas, on the other hand, is much lower at 42 percent. We recognize that many individuals still have time to pay their first month's premium, which is why we have asked the Insurers to update this information on May 20th.

As with any criticism or questions of the Affordable Care Act, the administration predictably protested and attempted to misrepresent the purpose of our inquiry. Let's be clear about why we had to engage in this exercise in the first place. The administration would not be transparent about enrollment and provide the underlying data. For the witnesses today, we ask you to be patient with our questions about enrollment and implementation. After months of promises about the status of Healthcare.gov from HHS officials, we have learned to be skeptical about blanket statements that everything is well.

One purpose of today's hearing is to examine enrollment because it is a key factor in measuring whether these exchanges are viable. We have a number of other questions for the witnesses today about the status of implementation. The ACA is more than a payment rate. We need to know if Americans can expect the premium reductions they were promised. We need to know if they can keep the plan they like. We need to know if they can keep their doctor. We cannot understand the status of the law and its implementation without hearing from you, the Insurance Companies, whose plans make up these exchanges.

Under the Presidents' Healthcare Law, these companies will receive Taxpayer dollars in the form of premium subsidy's and cost- sharing. We expect the witnesses today to provide the committee with facts and information about the first year of coverage under the Affordable Care Act. Thank you for--witnesses being here today and now I'd like to recognize the Ranking Member Ms. DeGette for five minutes.

DEGETTE: Thank you Mr. Chairman. I just want to take a few minutes since the Chairman has walked through the greatest hits of the problems they've had with the ACA, of where we stand now and where we stand after the first en--after the first enrollment period has just closed. So as we continue to get information about how the exchanges and the Affordable Care Act and the enrollment are performing, let's review what we already know.

The first thing is, despite the disastrous beginning of the net-- of the federal exchange; good news, the website was fixed. More than 8 million people signed up for insurance through the exchanges created through the affordable care act, which is more than a million more than we're originally projected before the disastrous unveiling. Now, of those 8 million people that waited to the last month of enrollment--of those 8 million people, 3 million of them waited till the last month of enrollment. And so their premiums are not due until April 30th or, in some cases, later than April 30th.

Even so, my colleagues, in their quest for knowledge on the other side of the aisle, sent out a questionnaire to insurers that manipulated the payment deadline to skew the understanding of how new insurance coverage is performing. How does that happen? Because they cut off the responses April 15th, at least two weeks before many of the premiums of these 3 million people were even due for payment. What this does is it skews the amount of people who are enrolled. Then, of course, they issued a press release post-haste.

Now, for years my friends on the other side of the aisle have made a series of claims that really are unsubstantiated. First, they claimed that the bill--(inaudible)--panels. Then they claimed that the bill would eliminate private insurance within three years. Then they claimed that the law would destroy millions of jobs. When they-- when the website was broken, they insisted the law would never meet enrollment goals.

Now, Mr. Chairman, today we finally have a chance to see in a snapshot, what's happening with the Affordable Care Act. And the facts reveal that every single one of those--of those claims were wrong. As of today, as I said, more than 8 million people enrolled in private plans through federal and state marketplaces. Millions more have enrolled through Medicaid and in off-exchange plans. Gallup just released a new poll finding that in the last six months the percentage of adults without insurance has dropped about 20 percent. And what that means is there are more than 11 million Americans with insurance today then there were 6 months ago.

Premiums are below the levels predicted by the Congressional Budget Office. And the agency has, once again, reiterated that the Affordable Care Act has slowed inflation and saved billions of dollars and will even reduce deficits. So by any rational reasonable measure, we can call this law success. And that success will make a real difference in people's lives. That's what's important here.

Yesterday, researches from the Harvard School of Public Health released a comprehensive study on the impacts of health insurance coverage. They were looking at mortality rates before and after the passage of Romney Care, the landmark Massachusetts health insurance expansion that served as an--as a model for the Affordable Care Act. They found that the mortality rate in Massachusetts fell by about 3 percent in the 4 years after passage of the state's health insurance law. And Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to put a copy of that study into the record.

MURPHY: Not an objection.

DEGETTE: Thank you. So if we can achieve that same level of success, nationwide, with the Affordable Care Act and there's no reason why we shouldn't be able to do so. That could result in 17,000 fewer deaths per year. That, Mr. Chairman, in a nutshell is what the Affordable Care Act means for Americans. Now, what I wish we could do in this sub-committee, and I've said this both publically and privately many, many times, is sit down with the ACA, figure out what the flaws are and figure out how we can work in a bipartisan way to fix it.

And that's what I think we should do. Instead, what we get is this misleading analysis last week, which said that only 67 percent of enrollees had paid for the coverage they enrolled in on the exchanges. And my--my Chairman, Mr. Upton, said, "The administrations rec--recent declarations of success may be unfounded." But, again, I will say the report was misleading because almost half of the enrollees in the healthcare exchanges, 40 percent of them, did not even have to make their initial premium payment until April 31st. I'm glad we've got the insurers here today to clear up this record. I'm glad we have everybody here to--to see exactly what we're talking about here.

So my suggestion is, let's look at the successes, let's look where we need to make improvements and let's work together to do just that. Thank you.

MURPHY: (Inaudible)--recommend the Chairman of the full committee, Mr. Upton, for five minutes.

MR. UPTON: With a friendly pat on the back, I'll just say April 31st has yet to come. 30 days has September, April, June and November. Thank you Mr. Chairman. I thank the witnesses for being here today as well, for sure. At this sub-committee our investigations are about getting the facts. A quest for transparency, the self-proclaimed most transparent administration in history has repeatedly dodged our simple questions about the healthcare law and refused the semblance of transparency about how its signature legislation--legislative achievement is or is not working.

We wanted the basic data from administration on enrollment one week after the launch of Healthcare.gov and the administration has rejected our request for more information each and every time. Members of the press have asked. The administration suggested the only way to get the facts was directly asking the insurance providers themselves. So we took their advice and we did just that, but the administration cried foul again.

We began asking about Healthcare.gov months before October 1st of last year. Repeatedly we were told that things were on track and working the way it was supposed to. We learned that this was not the case and the administration officials did everything in their power, it seems, to hide the chaos behind the scenes. The American public does deserve better. They deserve better than an administration that promised them $2500 in savings on healthcare premiums, only to see the cost rise sharply for many. They deserve better than an administration that repeated promises officials new that would be impossible to keep, promises that Americans could keep their doctors and keep their healthcare plans, also.

Like it or not, millions of Americans have found themselves with the unwelcome reality of cancellations and lost access to their trusted doctor. And one democratic colleague from Massachusetts said just two weeks ago, "The worst is yet to come." Today we are going to hear firsthand from the insurance providers about how implementation is working from their perspective. While the administration has declared this conversation over, the fact is that serious questions remain unanswered. And it is our responsibility to continue seeking the facts.

How many people have completed the enrollment process? Are the risks presented by these polls sustainable? How much more will premiums rise this next year? Is the back end of the website to be on track to be working by the next enrollment period? Are there any other delays or changes ahead that will disrupt the ability of families and businesses to plan for their healthcare coverage and needs? Will more healthcare plans be canceled in the coming years?

So what's wrong with seeking that information? Nothing that I know of. We released basic data points on enrollment as of April 15th and we'll do so again on the data that we collect through May 20th. The facts are the facts. And while the administration and its allies, furiously, try to muddy reality; the public deserves transparency. And while the administration toasts to the laws success with its Hollywood allies declaring this conversation over. We will continue our pursuit for facts for the American people so that we can finally have a full, accurate picture of this healthcare law. And I give the balance of my time to Dr. Burges.

DR. BURGES: I thank the Chairman for yielding. I thank our witnesses for being here today. I know it's not always easy or pleasant to come before this sub-committee. I, like the Chairman, wish that the administration would have been a little bit more forth coming about information, which would've obviated your need to be here today, but I do appreciate the fact that you responded to our request and that you have provided the data.

The fact remains the administration has withheld facts or changed facts during the roll out of this law. And that the federal agencies responsible for the implementation currently excel only in opacity. So you are here today to provide that transparency that the American people were promised earlier in this administration and I thank you for being here.

I have particular concern over one aspect and I will delve into it a little bit more during the questioning today, but that is the issue on the grace period, the 90 day period of time that is granted to people who are receiving the tax credits, the advanced tax credits for the offset of the cost of their insurance. If they don't pay their premium, in spite of the tax credit, they are given a grace period of 90 days. My understanding is that the companies will be responsible for the first 30 days; beyond that it will be the doctor, the hospital, the provider who submits the bill who may be on the hook for that.

And I am very interested to know what you have in development to keep practices, to keep providers apprised of the fact that a--a--a patients claim may be in a pending status when that claim is submitted. I know, from running a Doctors' Office, you always call and verify benefits, but now we have a new realm that we've entered into. Not only would you identify that somebody has been enrolled, but that they've paid and that they're current on their payments so that the provider in question would not be at risk.

So we will get into a little bit more on that in the question and answer period. I thank the Chairman for the time and yield back.

MURPHY: Gentleman, times expired. Now recognize the ranking member of the full-committee, Mr. Waxman for five minutes.

MR. WAXMAN: Thank you Mr. Chairman. Last week the republican whip, Representative Kevin McCarthy wrote an op-ed opposing the Affordable Care Act. He wrote, "President Obama needs to learn a simple lesson. Saying something doesn't make it true." Well, psychologists call this projection, a defense mechanism that involves ascribing your own behavior to others. In one phrase Representative McCarthy summed up five years of Republican opposition to the Affordable Care Act.

Over and over, Republican leaders have fabricated criticism of the Affordable Care Act and none of them have been true. Republican leaders said that the ACA would create death panels. Well, there are none in the law. Republican leaders said that the law was unconstitutional. The Supreme Court held exactly the opposite. Republican leaders said that the ACA would increase the deficit. Well, the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office found that the law will reduce deficits by over a trillion dollars.

Republican leaders said that the law would cause healthcare costs to sky rocket. In fact, in the 3 years after passage of the ACA, healthcare spending growth was at its lowest rate in 50 years. Republican leaders said that the law would cause massive job losses. In reality, there have been 48 consecutive months of job creation since the ACA was passed with more than 9.2 million jobs created. Republican leaders said there would be a huge loss of coverage under the law, but every independent analysis shows that the number of Americans with health insurance is growing and the number of uninsured, dropping rapidly.

Republicans said enrollment would fall short of CBO estimates because few Americans would sign up. At 8 million and growing, enrollment has exceeded everyone's expectations. Mr. Chairman, I just summarized 5 years of relentless republican opposition to the Affordable Care Act. It's a sad, and I believe, reprehensible record. The Republican Party is trying to scare families from getting the health insurance they need.

We saw the same pattern just last week when this committee released another report claiming imminent failure. This time, the report said that 1/3 of enrollees had not paid for coverage. There was just one problem. The data was incomplete, out of date and manipulated. Due to the late surge in enrollment, premiums were not even due for over 3 million Americans. The testimony we're going to hear today from the Insurers contradicts the Republican findings.

That testimony says that 80-90 percent of enrollees have paid their premiums. Mr. Chairman, it was a mistake to release those inaccurate and misleading findings and it's not the first time this is happened. This morning I released a memo describing the Republican record of distortion, exaggeration and misdirection. It's a sad record and I'd like to make it part of this hearing record. The simple fact is, despite 5 years of ceaseless opposition, the Affordable Care Act is working.

Over 8 million Americans have signed up for private healthcare coverage on the state and federal exchanges. Millions more have signed up for Medicaid. Premiums are well below CBO expectations. No American ever has to fear being discriminated against or denied coverage based on a pre-existing condition. No amount of blatant falsehoods and cynical partisan can obscure the facts. The Affordable Care Act is an enormous step forward in the health of our nation. And I yield back the balance of my time and I appreciate this opportunity to set the record straight.

MURPHY: Thank you. Gentleman yields back. We'll now move forward here with our witnesses. Just one moment please, because we went quicker and that's good. I just wasn't quite ready. So I'd like to introduce the panel for today's hearing. We have Mr. Mark Pratt who's a Senior Vice President of State Affairs for America's Health Insurance Plans. Mr. Frank Coyne is the Vice President of Operations and Chief Transformation Officer at Blue Cross Blue Shield Association. Mr. Paul Wingle--am I saying that correctly--is the executive Director of Individual Businesses and Public Exchange Operations and Strategy for Aetna. Mr. Brian Evanko is the President of Individual Segment for Cigna Health and Life Insurance Company. Mr. Darren--Mr. J. Darren Rodgers is the Senior Vice President and Chief Marketing Officer at the Healthcare Services Corporations. And Mr. Dennis Mathis is the President of Central Region and Exchange Strategy at Wellpoint, Inc.

I will now swear in the witnesses. You are aware that this committee is holding an investigative hearing and when doing say we have the practice of taking testimony under oath. Do any of you have any objections to testifying under oath? All the witnesses have indicated no. The Chair then advises you that under the rules of the house and the rules of the committee you are entitled to be advised by council. Do you desire to be advised by council during your testimony today? You do--are you saying--Mr. Wingle's saying you'd like to be advised by council? Well, if you're sitting by him that's fine.

Anybody else? You have council behind you. You certainly are welcome, at some point, to ask clarification from them, that's fine. In any case, would you all please rise and raise your right hand and I'll swear you in. Do you swear the testimony you are about to give is of truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth? Thank you. You may be seated. All the witnesses have taken that oath and you are now under oath and subject to the penalties set forth in title 18, section 1001 of the United States Code. We'll have you now each give a 5 minute opening statement, please. Stick to the 5 minutes. You'll see a red light go on when you're at the end of your time. Mr. Pratt, you may begin.

MR. PRATT: Chairman Murphy, Ranking Member DeGette and members of the sub-committee, I am Mark Pratt, Senior Vice President of State Affairs in America's Health Insurance Plans. I lead AHIPs Legislative and Regulatory activities in the states including implementation of the Affordable Care Act and our work with the National Association of Insurance Commissioners. We appreciate this opportunity to testify on enrollment on the new health insurance exchanges and implementation of the ACA.

Our written testimony focuses on two broad areas. One, our members experience in the ACAs initial open enrollment period for 2014 and two, our members priorities for improving access to high quality affordable health coverage in 2015 and beyond. Since the enactment of the ACA, our members have been working to implement the laws, many requirements with a strong focus on delivering high-value coverage options for consumers.

Helping them obtain the secure affordable coverage they need has been our central goal throughout the implementation process. While working on operational issues related to ACA implementation and providing recommendations to policy makers; our members have focused on several major goals. Among them, minimizing disruptions for consumers, businesses and stake holders; ensuring the workability of the exchanges and allowing state flexibility; maximizing choice and competition and addressing specific ACA provisions to make health coverage more affordable.

On numerous issues, our members have provided technical systems and expertise to assist federal agencies in resolving the operational challenges that surrounded the launch of the new exchanges and healthcare.gov website. They've devoted significant resources to performing manual processes and workarounds that were necessitated by the problems following the October 1 launch.

Despite the challenges our members encountered, we are proud that they ultimately were successful in offering a broad range of high- value coverage options to consumers who were enrolled in exchanges in 2014. HHS has reported that approximately 8 million individuals signed up for exchange plans during the initial open enrollment period for 2014. While uncertainty remains with respect to how many people have paid their first months premium, health insurers have been doing everything possible to encourage exchange enrollees to pay their premiums.

In the coming weeks we anticipate that there will be greater clarity in the question of how many exchange enrollees have paid their premiums. The number of individual plans have publicly announced the preliminary data and we anticipate that more announcements will be forthcoming. However, it may be a period of time before system-wide numbers and premium payments are available. Our members will continue their ongoing outreach to encourage exchange enrollees to pay their premiums.

Looking forward, we continue to believe that affordability must be the central priority as we focus on further expanding access to high quality affordable health coverage--health insurance coverage in 2015 and beyond. One critically important step that congress can take to make coverage more affordable is to delay the ACA health insurance tax and eventually repeal it. We are deeply concerned that this tax is undermining efforts to control cost and provide affordable coverage options.

We strongly support bipartisan legislation to fully repeal the tax introduced by Representatives Boustany and Matheson and cosponsored by 230 house members. We also support, as a short-term solution, separate bipartisan legislation that proposes a two year delay in the tax. On another front and in closing, we have worked closely with our members to provide comments to federal agencies on dozens of proposed rules and other regulatory documents. We consistently have emphasized the importance of creating a regulatory environment that promotes a wide range of affordable coverage options. Thank you again for this opportunity to testify. I look forward to your questions.

MURPHY: Thank you Mr. Pratt--(inaudible)--now we recognize Mr. Coyne for his 5 minutes. Thank you.

MR. COYNE: Good morning Chairman Murphy, Ranking Member DeGette and members of the sub-committee. Thank you for the invitation to testify here today. I am Frank Coyne, Vice President in the Office of the President for the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association, which represents the 37 independent community bases Blue Cross and Blue Shield Companies that collectively provide health coverage for 100 million Americans.

Blue Cross and Blue Shield Companies offer health care coverage in every zip code in the coverage and have long been committed to offering consumers across the country a wide variety of insurance options. My remarks today focus on the Blues participation in the multi-state plan program administered by the Office of Personnel Management and enrollment in Blue Cross and Blue Shield MSP plans. The Affordable Care Act authorizes OPM to contract with at least two entities; at least one of which must be a not for profit to offer products on the state and federal market places.

Under this multi-state plan program, OPM certifies health plans in conjunction with states for placement on the exchanges. For 2014, OPM certified Blue Cross and Blue Shield Companies to offer multi- state plan products in 30 states and the District of Columbia. Collectively, Blue Cross and Blue Shield Companies offer more than 150 multi-state plan products.

OPM has developed a standard contract for OPM issuers that meet its requirements. The association is party to the contract with OPM and our Blue licensee plans have agreements with us to fulfill many aspects of that contract such as customer enrollment, benefits and claims administration and customer service, among other activities. In addition, the contract contains a requirement to report enrollment information to OPM.

In order to fulfill this requirement, we ask Blue plans to report information on their multi-state plan enrollments to us and we convey enrollment information to OPM. As of April 1st, 2014 a total of 283,783 individuals an MSP plan. I appreciate the opportunity to discuss Blue participation in enrollment in the MSP plan and I look forward to your questions.

MURPHY: Thank you, Mr. Coyne. Now, Mr. Wingle you're recognized for 5 minutes. Does your--move it close--move it as close as you can get it.

MR. WINGLE: Oh sure. Thank you. Good morning Chairman Murphy, Ranking Member DeGette and distinguished members of the sub-committee. My name is Paul Wingle and I am Executive Director of Individual Business and Public Exchange Operations and Strategy at Aetna. Thank you for inviting us to today's hearing. I have a brief opening statement and will then be happy to answer any questions you may have.

Aetna is currently participating in the individual market on the exchanges in 17 states. Over the course of approximately the last two months, Aetna has worked with the sub-committee to provide requested data and information related to enrollment in plans offered through federally facilitated market places. As of the third week of April, Aetna had over 600,000 members who had enrolled and roughly 500,000 members who had paid. For those who had reached their payment due date, the payment rate, though dynamic, has been in the low to mid 80 percent range.

As outlined in our prior submissions to the sub-committee, these are dynamic figures and do not reflect final enrollment numbers as some enrollees have not yet reached their payment due dates. An example would be a member with the June 1 policy effective date who has not yet paid, but whose initial payment is not yet due.

We're happy to continue to work with the subcommittee to provide updated information and data and note that as a subcommittee is recognized, this might include material, nonpublic, confidential and proprietary information. Thank you again for the opportunity to be here today, and I will be happy to answer any questions you may have.

MURPHY: Thank you, Mr. Wingle. Yield back.

And now Mr. Evanko. You're recognized for five minutes.

EVANKO: Chairman Murphy, Ranking Member DeGette, members of the subcommittee. Good morning. And thank you for the opportunity to testify at this hearing on PPACA enrollment in the insurance industry.

I'm Brian Evanko, and I currently serve as president of the U.S. Individual Segment at Cigna Corporation. I oversee the operation tasks with developing, promoting and maintaining the Cigna products that are offered in the individual health market.

Including those products that are offered on the exchanges set up pursuant to the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act or ACA. Cigna's a global health services company dedicated to helping people improve their health, well-being and sense of security. Through its subsidiaries, Cigna offers an integrated suite of health services, such as medical, dental, behavioral health, pharmacy and vision care benefits, along with other related products, including group disability, life and accident coverage.

We employ more than 26,000 people and have sales capability in 30 countries and jurisdictions. We manage more than 80 million customer relationships throughout the world. Despite our large footprint, 80 percent of Cigna's overall healthcare business consists of administrative services. This means that we help employers to administer their policies.

We also administer claims processes, which are not risk-based like traditional insurance. Many of the employers that we assist are self-insuring, and the claim payments come out of the employers' own funds.

Cigna's traditional insurance business is concentrated in a large group market. We have a very limited presence in the individual market, including on the ACA exchanges. The individual market currently constitutes approximately three percent of Cigna's total revenue. We currently offer health insurance products on the exchanges in five states, four of which, Arizona, Florida, Tennessee and Texas, are federally facilitated marketplaces. The only state run exchange in which Cigna's participating is in Colorado.

We have entered the exchanges on a focused basis in 2014 to gather deeper learning about consumer behaviors in the individual market, to understand the operational implications of how the exchanges function, and as a potential longer term source of growth for Cigna.

For 2014, we did not expect the exchanges to have a significant financial impact on our company. The health insurance marketplace is evolving rapidly, and Cigna, like other health insurance companies, is constantly challenged to maintain affordability, accessibility and consumer choice in its product offerings. Cigna has worked collaboratively with our clients and customers, healthcare professionals, state and federal regulators, as well as other stakeholders to maintain our heritage of providing high quality health insurance products and services while adapting to the ACA and other statutory and regulatory changes.

We believe that healthcare is a shared responsibility of the individual, the private sector, the medical community and the government. Accordingly, we look forward to how we can all work together to improve the health and wellness of, and the quality of care for, all Americans. I welcome any questions you may have.

MURPHY: Mr. Evanko, yield back.

And it'll go to Mr. Rodgers to be recognized up to five minutes.

RODGERS: Good morning, Chairman Murphy. Good morning, Chairman Murphy, and members of the subcommittee. I'm Darren Rodgers.

(CROSSTALK)

RODGERS: Good morning again, everyone. I'm Darren Rodgers. I'm Senior Vice President and Chief Marketing Officer at Healthcare Service Corporation or HCSC. HCSC is a mutual legal reserve company, which does business as Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Illinois, Montana, New Mexico, Oklahoma and Texas. HCSC is the largest customer-owned, nonprofit health insurance company in the nation.

We're headquartered in Chicago, Illinois, with a workforce of nearly 20,000 employees, serving nearly 14 million members throughout our five state Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans. For over 80 years, HCSC has been committed to expanding access to cost-effective healthcare to as many people as possible in every part of each of our five states.

Whether through employer sponsored insurance, government programs or individual products, HCSC is committed to its purpose and to offering our customers a wide range of cost-effective and sustainable product choices to meet the needs of -- to meet their health and wellness needs.

As we transition to a new healthcare marketplace, HCSC remains committed to its individual and small employer markets in continuing to offer accessible products, particularly to those individuals who do not have access to employer-sponsored coverage. We're proud of what our brands stand for, security and peace of mind, in our commitment to the communities in which we operate, as well as our large and geographically diverse network of healthcare providers in our operating states. This allows us to offer a variety of affordable product choices in every county of every state in which we operate.

To support our individual and small employer market, HCSC participated in the health insurance exchanges. We offered a similar portfolio of products both on and off exchange, with a variety of deductibles, copays, coverages and other options, with the goal of meeting our members' diverse healthcare needs.

At the current time, enrollment and payment information can only be presented as of each day when the numbers are counted. As such, there are natural lags between the effective date of coverage and the date on which the members' coverage payment may be due. For instance, applicants with policies with an effective date of May 1, still have time remaining in their payment deadline.

In addition, adjustments and reconciliations to this data are ongoing. The data HCSC is providing represents our good faith estimate based on our records to date. With these caveats, HCSC received between October 1, 2013 and April 15, 2014, approximately 830,000 applications across our five states, comprised of approximately 600,000 on exchange and 230,000 off exchange applications. We estimate that these 830,000 applications represent coverage for just over 1.2 million applicants.

In the written copy of my opening statement we provided a snapshot of our current first month payment rates. As you can see, January through April look fairly consistent and range from 83 to 93 percent. The payment rates for May are currently less, because payments are still coming in and being posted.

HCSC is, and always has been, committed to improving access to quality of care for all Americans. I thank you on behalf of HCSC for the opportunity to be a part of this important discussion.

MURPHY: Ladies and gentlemen, now Mr. Mathis here recognized for five minutes.

MATHIS: Chairman Murphy, Ranking Member DeGette, and members of the House Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations. Thank you for the opportunity to be here today on behalf of WellPoint.

I am Dennis Mathis, president of the Central Region and Exchange Strategy. I'm responsible for creating WellPoint's exchange strategy and overseeing its launch. Prior to my current role, I was president of Anthem Blue Cross and Blue Shield in Missouri.

WellPoint is one of the nation's leading health benefit companies. We believe that our health connects us all. So we focus on being a valued health partner and delivering quality products and services that give members access to the care they need. With nearly 67 million people served by our affiliated companies, including nearly 37 million enrolled in our family health plans, we can make a real difference to meet the needs of our diverse constituents.

We are an independent licensee of the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association. We serve members as the Blue Cross licensee for California, and as the Blue Cross and Blue Shield licensee for Colorado, Connecticut, Georgia, Indiana, Kentucky, Maine, Missouri, Nevada, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Virginia and Wisconsin.

In most of these service areas, our plans do business as Anthem Blue Cross, Anthem Blue Cross and Blue Shield, Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Georgia, and Empire Blue Cross Blue Shield or Empire Blue Cross. We also serve customers in other states through our Amerigroup and CareMore subsidiaries.

WellPoint is currently operating in the federally facilitated exchange, which includes Georgia, Indiana, Maine, Missouri, New Hampshire, Ohio, Virginia and Wisconsin. We also participate in several state-based exchanges, including California, Colorado, Connecticut, Kentucky, New York and Nevada.

While there is no doubt that implementation of the exchanges presents a complex and daunting undertaking, we believe we've been able to apply our knowledge and experience to make the system work better for our members. We are seeing strong membership growth, and large percentages of our newly enrolled customers are successfully paying their premiums by the due date.

Our most important priority through all of the complexity of ACA implementation is to ensure that our members receive the best possible care. Working closely and collaboratively with the physician community, our innovative programs, from new payment models to telehealth solutions, to sophisticated data analytics that arm physicians with better information, we are creating value for our members, for physicians and for the healthcare system. We are proud of the work we are doing to transform healthcare.

WellPoint was pleased to provide the committee last month with enrollment data from October 1, 2013, through April 20 -- April 15, 2014, for states where we participate in the federally facilitated exchange.

As we stated to the committee at the time of submission, this data is not final, and only represents a snapshot in time. The data included enrollees whose policies have effective dates of April 1, May 1, and June 1, which means that premiums for such policies would not be due until April 10, May 10, and June 10, respectively.

Also, the reported enrollment and premium payment data is subject to adjustments. For examples, enrollees may elect to drop their coverage, elect to change the effective date of their coverage after submission of their application, or continue to enroll through special enrollment periods.

In response to the committee's request, we submitted the total number of applications received for enrollment in the federally facilitated exchange during the period October 1, 2013, through April 15, 2014. The percentage of applications that have paid a premium will differ depending on whether the percentages calculated based on the total number of applications and premium payments received during this entire period, roughly 70 percent, or as calculated based on the total number of applications and premium payments received for policies whose premium deadline has passed. Ranging up to 90 percent, depending on the state.

WellPoint feels privileged to be able to serve our growing community of members. We take great pride in transforming healthcare with trusted, caring, creative and innovative solutions. I thank the committee for the opportunity to testify today on behalf of WellPoint, and look forward to your questions.

MURPHY: Thank you. Well, just for record, all the witnesses did not go over time, and we'll make sure we fill in the gaps here, which was -- not been provided to us. And see if we can get some information.

Do any of you, particularly from the insurance companies, do any of you have -- I'm recognizing myself for five minutes, by the way, have any data among those people who're subscribed, is if the cost their paying for their overall health insurance plan is more, less or the same as they were paying in a previous year? Mr. Wingle, does your, do you keep, that data?

WINGLE: I don't have that data available.

MURPHY: Mr. Evanko? Do you know if you might have some?

EVANKO: I don't have specific figures to share. I can try to provide some context.

MURPHY: Would you submit that for the record? Mr. Rodgers, Mr. Mathis, do your plans keep that record of what people paid in the previous year versus what they're paying now?

RODGERS: No, I haven't looked.

MURPHY: Thank you. And of those who have signed up for insurance, do any of your companies ask for, have any data, if people were among those who had lost their insurance? That is, their insurance was canceled because it changed in the Affordable Care Act. Any of you from insurance companies? Any of you have that data?

WINGLE: No.

EVANKO: We currently do not have that information available.

MURPHY: OK. And all right. Thank you. So we don't know if the people who are signing up for these health insurance plans are people who are renewing insurance, had lost insurance, or never had insurance; am I correct? Mr. Wingle, Mr. Evanko, Mr. Rodgers, Mathis? OK.

EVANKO: That's correct.

MATHIS: No.

MURPHY: I know Secretary Sebelius said that she did not think we had that data either.

Mr. Wingle, your Chief Executive, Mark Bertolini, said that premium rates in 2015 will range from very low single digits to some that will be over double digits. Can consumers expect this for their 2015 premiums?

WINGLE: It's important to recognize, first of all, that we're at the start of the rate filing and approval process, so we're very early in the process of establishing those rates and submitting them to state regulators for approval and review. Our rates, it's also important to understand, reflect a number of key factors, most importantly the benefits covered by the plans we're filing, the population covered by those plans, and the underlying healthcare costs in the geographies where those plans are offered. There will be some variability across geography and depending on those circumstances.

MURPHY: Some might face double-digit increases. We don't know yet, you're saying?

WINGLE: I can't say for certain whether some will pay double digits, single digits, or no increase at all. It's too early to say.

MURPHY: If there's no increase in insurance, we should all celebrate, because I'm not sure that has existed in my lifetime.

(OFF-MIKE)

MURPHY: What's that?

(OFF-MIKE)

MURPHY: Will there -- will there be decreases?

WINGLE: It's hard to say. It'll vary by geography and ratings.

MURPHY: All right. Mr. Mathis, you announced your quarterly earnings and notice that the ramp-up in the fee of government is charging insurers under the healthcare law would impact marketplace premiums next year. What can consumers expect?

MATHIS: So similar to my colleague's comment, we are in the process of developing our rates now for the 138 rating regions in which we do business across the 14 states. So I don't have exact numbers yet, Chairman, in terms of what our rate increases are going to be. Certainly inputs into that are the experience that we're developing through the population that we're serving, the expected medical trend that's going to occur, and then the fees and taxes that occur through the ACA and through state and other federal constructs. That all goes into the right construct process.

MURPHY: I think I'm going down the same hall with each of you, so let me cut to the chase. The bottom line here is you do get, for risk corridors, you do get some money back from the federal government to balance out some of your costs; am I correct? With each plan? Mr. Evanko, is that true?

EVANKO: Risk corridors, as you know, sir, are part of the three R's. We, at Cigna Corporation, are not expecting in material, receivable or payable, as it relates to risk corridors.

MURPHY: I'm -- my point is that as we're looking at this data, and we'll continue to monitor, and we recognize some of this is too preliminary, based upon who has signed up and what their healthcare costs are. For example, if we don't reach, if you don't reach the 40 percent number that the president had hoped, of people between 18 and 35, and mostly those who signed up have been older and sicker, then that's going to have an impact upon your plan cost. Am I correct, Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Could -- could you restate that question?

MURPHY: That if people who have signed up are not the young, healthy invincibles, but are, indeed, the older folks who have preexisting conditions and other healthcare costs, that you're gonna have to face some sort of increase in premiums; am I correct?

RODGERS: Well, as two of my colleagues have said, the rates that we file for 2015 haven't been finalized yet, but those will reflect...

(CROSSTALK)

MURPHY: Understand. I'm anticipating.

(CROSSTALK)

RODGERS: ... cost...

(CROSSTALK)

MURPHY: You've been in the business for a while. And the federal government does provide some funds for -- for you to help balance these out; am I correct? There's, federal money, comes to help as the risk corridors and you have other people there who increase cost (inaudible); am I correct?

RODGERS: The three R's program does exist to provide...

MURPHY: Right.

RODGERS: ... some guardrails. We have not...

MURPHY: But over time, that amount of money from the federal government will decline; am I correct?

RODGERS: Some of those programs are traditional, transitional, and one's permanent.

MURPHY: I understand. But we're going to, we'll get back to this. Thank you.

I yield, recognize, Miss DeGette for five minutes.

DEGETTE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Last week, the majority republicans on this committee put out a report stating that only 67 percent of the people who signed up for insurance through the state and federal marketplaces has paid their first month's premiums and then had a big press blitz about that, saying that Obamacare had once again failed. So I -- I kind of want to walk some of you through that allegation and see how true it is.

I want to start with you, Mr. Mathis. I believe that the press reports I've seen, the reports from the administration, show that -- that through the end of March, which was the deadline, about 8.1 people enrolled through either the federal or state exchanges. Is that correct, to your knowledge?

MATHIS: Did you mean 8.1 million?

DEGETTE: Yes.

MATHIS: Yes.

DEGETTE: And -- and...

MATHIS: I -- I have the same source of data that -- that you do on that point.

DEGETTE: That's fine. Now, in your -- in your testimony, you said that the data used in that republican analysis, quote, "included enrollees whose policies have effective dates of April 1, May 1, and June 1." Is that correct?

MATHIS: Yes.

DEGETTE: And that's about three million out of eight million people, about 40 percent; is that correct?

MATHIS: Again, since we didn't enroll all eight million people, I can't attest to that question or not.

DEGETTE: But -- okay. Well, I will say what I've seen is it's about three million out of eight million. Now, so the three million people who enrolled, or let me just say, the people who enrolled in March, they had coverage, in general, that began no -- no earlier than May 1; is that right?

MATHIS: If you enrolled in March, you would have potentially an effective date, depending on what day of the month you enrolled in. Could be April 1. Could've been May 1.

DEGETTE: May 1. And so those people's premiums were not due until, at the earliest, the end of April; is that correct? If you enrolled March 31, your premiums were due at the end of April, or later, right?

MATHIS: To help facilitate members enrolling, what we have done at WellPoint is actually extended the payment period 10 days beyond last day of...

(CROSSTALK)

DEGETTE: So it could -- it could be...

MATHIS: ... month.

DEGETTE: ... April 30 or it could even be later, correct?

MATHIS: So an April 1...

DEGETTE: "Yes," or "No," will work.

MATHIS: An April 1 effective...

DEGETTE: Right.

MATHIS: ... could actually have until May 10 to pay their premiums.

DEGETTE: OK. Now, Mr. Mathis, let me ask you. Your testimony said for WellPoint ACA policies whose deadline for paying premiums has passed, about 90 percent had paid their premiums; is that correct?

MATHIS: So our data in our...

DEGETTE: You can say "Yes," or "No." That's what your testimony said.

MATHIS: Yes. So it...

DEGETTE: OK. Now, that's more than 67 percent; is that correct?

MATHIS: Last time I looked, yeah.

DEGETTE: OK.

MATHIS: It's been greater than 67.

DEGETTE: Now, Mr. Wingle, let me -- let me take you off the hot seat, Mr. Mathis.

Mr. Wingle, I want to ask you. Aetna has shown, of the -- of the five to six hundred enrollees who have paid, about 85 percent up until March paid their premiums; is that correct?

WINGLE: Our range is in the low to mid-80s month to month.

DEGETTE: OK. And that's also more than 67 percent, isn't it?

WINGLE: Empirically, yes.

DEGETTE: Yes. And Mr. Rodgers, let me ask you for your company. The ACA payment policies whose premium payment deadlines have passed, about 83 to 85 percent of them have paid their premiums; is that correct?

RODGERS: Except for the most recent month.

DEGETTE: The ones whose payment deadlines have passed.

RODGERS: Yes, that's correct.

DEGETTE: Yes. And that's also more than 67 percent, isn't it?

RODGERS: That is more than 67 percent.

DEGETTE: Yeah. So -- so what I wanted to -- to ask about -- what I wanted to ask about is do any of you expect to see substantially lower payment percentages than you saw historically? Before the latest enrollment? Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: So I -- I will give a little context to my answer.

DEGETTE: OK. I -- I need a "Yes," or "No." I don't have much time. I'm sorry.

MATHIS: Well...

(CROSSTALK)

DEGETTE: Do you expect to see it go down to 67 percent for April?

MATHIS: I don't think we have enough information to know exactly ...

DEGETTE: OK.

MATHIS: ... where it's going to be.

DEGETTE: OK. Well, Mr. Rodgers, let me ask you this question then. Mr. Upton said that he thinks suddenly maybe they won't pay for their enrollment in March. So I wanted to kind of go through, because you've got a nice chart in your testimony, and it shows the -- the payments month by month that people made when they enrolled. So for 1-1-2014, on the exchange, 85 percent of the people paid; is that correct?

RODGERS: That's correct.

DEGETTE: For 2-1-2014, 86 percent paid, correct?

RODGERS: That's correct.

DEGETTE: For 3-1-2014, 88 percent paid; is that correct?

RODGERS: Yes.

DEGETTE: And for 4-1-2014, 83 percent paid; is that correct?

RODGERS: That is correct.

DEGETTE: And you're still waiting for everybody else to pay the -- because their deadline has not passed yet; is that correct?

RODGERS: That's correct.

DEGETTE: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

MURPHY: And can I just follow up with a clarifying question. When she asked about historical data, were you referring to the last couple months or a comparison with previous years under different plans?

BLACKBURN: Well, we didn't have an exchange.

MURPHY: No, no. I -- I just...

DEGETTE: Chairman, we only just got the exchange.

MURPHY: No. I -- I wasn't sure if you meant under historical, you mean previous years of plans, versus just the exchange.

BLACKBURN: No. (Inaudible).

DEGETTE: Chairman, what I mean is since -- since the ACA...

MURPHY: OK.

DEGETTE: ... was implemented starting on October ...

MURPHY: Thank you. I just wanted clarification on that.

Now recognizing Miss Blackburn for five minutes.

BLACKBURN: Thank you all so much for being with us. I want to stay with this issue on the premiums, because we get asked about this a lot.

So Mr. Wingle? Aetna. Your CEO said the premium increases will vary over 17 states and encompass 100 -- 132 rating areas, correct?

WINGLE: That is correct.

BLACKBURN: OK. Can you identify where premiums will decrease in 2015? What identification can you place on that?

WINGLE: At this point in the filing season, we can't offer any guidance on or speculate on where they're going to fall. We're still gathering the information pile.

BLACKBURN: None?

WINGLE: I -- I can't say none.

BLACKBURN: OK.

WINGLE: I can't say any.

BLACKBURN: Mr. Mathis? Can you tell me any, identify any states, where you are offering products in the exchanges where consumers can expect a premium decrease?

MATHIS: At this juncture we do not have the information.

BLACKBURN: You don't have the information?

MATHIS: No. The filing -- the filing rates are -- are due starting in late May into June, and so we have not computed yet with any certainty what the actual rates are going to look like in our 138 rating regions.

BLACKBURN: OK. Lot of uncertainty floating around out there. OK. Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: I -- I would echo my colleagues' comments. We're in the process of making decisions. Some decisions on certain assumptions been made, but most assumptions are still to be determined, so ...

BLACKBURN: So you don't know if your consumers are going to see any decreases. You know, they were promised decreases through the Affordable Care Act. So OK.

Mr. Rodgers? To you.

RODGERS: As the company's marketing officer, I can tell you I'm not involved in rate setting, but I'm aware of some of the deadlines we're facing, which are generally toward the end of June...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: OK. Well, let me ask you all this then. Have any of you conducted any internal analysis of what your organization's premiums are going to look like in 2015? Do any of you have any internal analysis? Raise your hand for me.

So you all have conducted no -- we've got some of our nation's biggest insurers and you have done no internal analysis on what the trend line is for these premiums? None? Oh ...

EVANKO: Miss Blackburn...

BLACKBURN: ... Mr. Evanko. Have at it.

EVANKO: I -- I'd like to just clarify our comments here a little bit, at least my comments, as it relates to this issue. So the decisions related to this are very complicated, and they impact each individual a little bit differently, because of where someone's located, maybe what their APTC eligibility is, et cetera. So there's a long list of reasons there.

BLACKBURN: Right. We -- we understand that. You're talking about a 2300 page law that became about over 20,000 pages of rules and regulations, and we know this changes daily. We appreciate the predicament that you are in. We also appreciate the predicament that our constituents find themselves in. And it is baffling that we can have some of our nation's largest ensures, and you all don't have any internal analysis as to what these rates are -- I thought that reading your reports you all did analysis and trend lines for the near-term, the mid-term and the long-term and you looked at what the expectations were so that your stakeholders would all be aware of what was happening within that market.

You know, has anybody done any kind of analysis?

MATHIS: Can I (inaudible)?

BLACKBURN: Yes, please. Have at it, Mr. Mathis. Your mike, please.

MATHIS: So analysis is typically ongoing in our organization. Rate development typically takes three to six months to occur, once you have credible information. And so just for context purposes, we, as has been stated earlier in this meeting ...

BLACKBURN: OK. Let me ask...

MATHIS: Let me please finish.

BLACKBURN: OK. Go ahead.

MATHIS: We are just now understanding what membership we have attracted.

BLACKBURN: OK.

MATHIS: And so the work is ongoing.

BLACKBURN: OK.

MATHIS: But it has not been finalized. And that...

BLACKBURN: OK. Let me ask you this.

MATHIS: ... that's the important point.

BLACKBURN: What has been prepared for your CEO?

MATHIS: At...

BLACKBURN: Any of you.

MATHIS: At this juncture, we do not have a compiled package to sit down and say, "Here's what we believe a rate is going to be in..."

BLACKBURN: OK.

MATHIS: "... any of our 130...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: When do you expect to have that?

MATHIS: Typically it will be towards the end of this month. As rates need to be filed in our state starting end of May through the June-July time period.

BLACKBURN: OK. Would you submit that to us for the record, each of you? Do you agree? To submit this for the record so that we will have this?

(UNKNOWN): OK. I -- in representative, I want to concur with my colleague, we are constantly analyzing our exchange experience. This is a new population. We don't have a long claims record or history we have from the -- we had in the previous market. So the more data we get, the better, and more confident we feel as we propose rates. It's an ongoing analysis. It's a constant.

BLACKBURN: OK. We appreciate that, and we would like to have that analysis and the information you have as you get it and ask that you please stay in touch with us and do those orderly insertions for the record.

I yield back, Mr. Chairman.

MURPHY: Gentleman (sic) yields back. And now recognized, Mr. Dingell for five minutes.

DINGELL: Mr. Chairman, I thank you for your courtesy, and I thank you for the hearing.

I'm pleased the committee's examining the first open enrollment period under the Affordable Care Act. I would like to examine the staff report where it claims only 67 percent of Obamacare enrollees have paid their first month's premium. We're going to find out whether that's so and what -- what it means.

The bottom line, I think, is the ACA is working. After a turbulent start, we got the website up and running, and HHS now reports that eight million people have selected plans through the exchanges.

Furthermore, some 4.8 million people are enrolled in Medicaid and gyp (ph). And that number would be much higher if all 50 states chose to expand Medicaid. CBO estimates that another five million people purchased ACA compliant plans outside the marketplaces. Finally, Gallup just found that the percentage of Americans who do not have health insurance fell to 13.4 percent, down from some 18 percent one year ago. So let's examine and see what goes on.

This question to Mr. Mathis. And "Yes," or "No," if you please. When WellPoint turned over enrollment figures to the majority, you did this under the caveat that the data was not final and only represented a snapshot in time; is that correct?

MATHIS: Yes, it is.

DINGELL: Yes?

MATHIS: Yes.

DINGELL: Now, this question, again, to you, Mr. Mathis. And that is because the committee only requested data through April 15, 2014; is that correct?

MATHIS: Yes, it is.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Mathis, is it correct that the people who signed up after May 15 may not have to pay their premium until later in April, May or even June? Yes or no?

MATHIS: Is there anybody after April 15 would have longer time?

DINGELL: That's -- who signed up after March 15?

MATHIS: Yes.

DINGELL: Now, Mr. Mathis, is it correct that nearly 90 percent of WellPoint's customers whose premium deadline has passed have already paid their first month's premium? Yes or no?

MATHIS: Yes, it is.

DINGELL: Now, in your experience, have you found that people are more likely to make their premium payment right before the deadline?

MATHIS: That is typically human nature, sir.

DINGELL: And we -- we know that from the behavior of Americans with regard to income tax and things like that.

Now, this question is for Mr. Wingle of Aetna. Is it correct that according to your best estimate, roughly 80 percent of Aetna beneficiaries who've reached their payment due date have paid their first month's premium; yes or no?

WINGLE: Month to month it ranges from the low to mid-80s.

DINGELL: Say it again?

WINGLE: It ranges from the low to mid-80s month by month.

DINGELL: Thank you.

Now, this question for you, Mr. Coyne of Blue Cross Blue Shield. Is it correct that according to your best estimate, 80 to 85 percent of the individuals buying Blue Cross Blue Shield plans through the marketplace have paid their first months' premiums? Yes or no?

COYNE: Yes, that is correct.

DINGELL: I'm not hearing you, sir.

COYNE: Yes, that is correct. Based on...

DINGELL: That's correct.

COYNE: ... a report we...

(CROSSTALK)

DINGELL: Now, gentlemen, it doesn't take, I think, a genius, or an atomic physicist, to figure out the numbers we just heard from the -- and actual insurance companies greatly differ from the staff report. I hope everyone will take these companies at their word, instead of falling for smoke and mirrors from my friends on the other side of the aisle. I can understand why my friends on the other side of the aisle are not in attendance, because they would get a very unpleasant taste of fact, which they might not like.

My old daddy taught me, he used to say to me, "Son, figures don't lie, but liars can figure." And I've always thought that it would be a good thing when this committee does its business, that we know what we're doing, that we deal in hard facts, so that when the legislation that we work on, the laws that we are dealing with, the oversight in which we engage, actually lead us to truth and correct response, so that public policies may be mounted on fact rather than fiction, and on staff reports that mislead all. I would suggest that the staff reports should be reviewed with the utmost of care, and deposited then very carefully in the nearest large wastebasket.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

MURPHY: Gentleman yields back. Now recognize the Vice Chair of the committee, Mr. Burgess, or Dr. Burgess, for five minutes.

BURGESS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I thank you for the recognition.

Remind the chairman emeritus that we are friends. Let me ask you a question. April 17, the day the president came out with Mission Accomplished speech at the White House in the press briefing, there was a briefing of executives of your companies; is that correct? Anyone is free to answer.

MATHIS: I believe -- I believe that was correct, sir.

WINGLE: Yes.

BURGESS: Mm-hm. And was your company represented?

EVANKO: I'm not sure which particular meeting you're describing, but I -- I know there have been some.

BURGESS: Well, let me give you the particular meeting. It was on April the 17th, at 1:35 p.m. The president and vice president meet with insurance executives in the Roosevelt Room. Did that meeting take place?

MATHIS: WellPoint was present at that meeting, sir.

BURGESS: WellPoint was present. Was Cigna present?

EVANKO: Our CEO was not present at that meeting.

BURGESS: Was not. OK.

EVANKO: I'm advised that our CEO was not present at that meeting.

BURGESS: And was Blue Cross?

WINGLE: That's Aetna, for me.

BURGESS: Was Blue Cross represented at the meeting?

COYNE: I -- I don't have that information right now.

BURGESS: Well, for -- for those that were...

RODGERS: And just for the record, I'm advised that (inaudible) president was present at the meeting.

PRATT: Yeah. And I -- I don't -- I can't remember the exact date of those meetings, but I can tell you that when we're called to the White House, generally we would attempt to be there.

BURGESS: Was April 17. And I would think you'd remember. It's a pretty big deal. I mean, I haven't had a meeting with the president and vice president.

BLACKBURN: Will the gentlemen yield? Perhaps...

BURGESS: No, I will not.

BLACKBURN: ... they could answer were they there?

BURGESS: No, I will not. My time is -- my time is limited. What I would like from those that answered affirmatively, Mr. Mathis and Mr. Pratt, can you provide us information as to what was covered in that meeting? Who made the presentation, how long it was, and was there, in fact, time for there to be question and answer? Was it simply a presentation to you from the president and vice president?

MATHIS: Mr. Congressman, I was not personally present at that meeting. Our CEO was, and I do not know the facts of the meeting.

BURGESS: Would -- would you make an attempt to answer for me those questions? Was, in fact, was this an interactive process, or was this a proclamation? Was it a monologue or was it a dialogue?

And Mr. Pratt, if you would provide us that information as well.

And here's the deal. I mean, why am I making -- why am I making a big deal of this? You all are here today because the White House won't respond to us. And I would think, if it was possible for the White House to provide a briefing to your executives on April 17, that same person could be made available to this committee and be prepared to answer our questions.

I -- I don't see what is so difficult about that. If the news is as great as everyone has said it is this morning, I -- I -- I think that they would welcome the opportunity to come to our committee and give us the information that we're asking for.

Look. One of the questions that I raised in the opening statement, and I do want your answers on this because it is important, this 90-day grace period and the coverage that can't be canceled during that 90-day grace period because of nonpayment. Is there any way for any of your individual companies to keep up with that information on a rolling basis and keep your providers informed as to the status of a person's payment or nonpayment of their premium?

Start with you, Mr. Coyne, and let's just work down the table.

COYNE: We're working with blue plans to inform providers of the enrollees' status, as you indicated.

BURGESS: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: Yes. We do have a unique identifier for our exchange membership on the I.D. card, and we do provide updates on the members' payment status in our physician information centers. So when the physician offices call or the provider calls, they understand what the payment status is of the member.

BURGESS: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: Our doctors in our hospitals that are servicing our customers have the ability to call or check online the status of the individual's payment, grace period situation.

BURGESS: Mr. Rodgers, would that even pertain to you?

RODGERS: Yes. Similarly, we have electronic means as well as telephone service as well, providers of various types of verified coverage.

BURGESS: And Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: Yes. We provide the same service.

BURGESS: And what I would ask of each of you is will you make available to the committee the type of information and how it is transferred to your providers, your doctors and hospitals, when they call for that information?

And then, Mr. Chairman, further, I'd like to ask unanimous consent. The secretary was here in December, the Secretary of Health and Human Services. After that hearing, I submitted a letter to the secretary with several questions that I wanted answered. They have not been answered to date. I am going to ask those same questions of our insurance representatives today. I'm going to ask those in writing, and I would appreciate your response to those questions that the secretary was unwilling to answer.

BLACKBURN: Reserving the right to object.

I would just point out that the secretary was here in front of this committee testifying three times last year, and we -- if there's questions she has not answered, we certainly will be happy to work with the majority and get those questions answered.

MURPHY: Well, we -- members do have the right to...

(CROSSTALK)

BLACKBURN: ... reservations.

MURPHY: ... submit questions for...

(CROSSTALK)

BURGESS: And I will be submitting those questions in writing for our panel.

MURPHY: OK.

BURGESS: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

MURPHY: Mr. Green, you're now recognized for five minutes.

GREEN: Thank you, Chairman Murphy, and Ranking Member DeGette, for having this hearing today in our witnesses for the testimony.

Our district in Texas is a very urban district in Houston and has one of the highest rates of uninsured people who don't receive insurance through their employer in the country. One of the other talking points that my republican colleagues have seized upon last year, especially when the healthcare.gov was encountering problems early in the enrollment period was the idea that fewer people would have health insurance following the implementation of the Affordable Care Act than did beforehand.

Now I know that all our representatives here today see that the information and how many people that were enrolled and their total number of customers proprietary and I understand that. But you all also, I would hope, familiar with the general insurance landscape and how it's changed under the Affordable Care Act. Earlier this week, a Gallup poll released a survey examining the total number of Americans that have insurance. Mr. Pratt, are you familiar with that survey?

PRATT: Generally, yes.

GREEN: The Gallup poll conducted interviews with 14,000 American adults. Gallup found that the number of adults without insurance had dropped to its lowest level since the beginning of 2008. A drop of this magnitude correlates to more than 11 million people gaining coverage. Are you familiar enough with the poll to -- to say that that sounds like a reasonable amount?

PRATT: Congressman, I think that's what they reported. I'm not in position to say whether that's a reasonable amount or not.

GREEN: OK. OK.

Anyone else on the panel want to talk about that Gallup poll? Because, you know, again, these are -- there are what we're seeing. And since the enrollment period end. Rand and Urban Institute released similar reports in March and April. Are any of you familiar with these reports?

PRATT: I'm not...

MATHIS: Very generally.

PRATT: ... I'm not familiar with the reports.

GREEN: OK. Well, in early April, Rand Corporation released results of their poll, which found overall number of Americans with insurance had grown to 9.3 million as of mid-March. Even before the late enrollment date surge. The Urban Institute also released a report in the past month suggesting that millions more people have coverage than before the ACA was implemented.

My question of any of our witnesses, would you agree that the findings of these, whether it be Rand, Gallup or the Urban Institute, are consistent with millions of Americans signing up for health insurance? Did y'all experience that with your companies? During the signup that they selected your company as part of the, if you were having to be part of the exchange, both national or the state exchanges?

MATHIS: Congressman, we do not have, at WellPoint, we do not have enough information at this point to know how many uninsured are actually among the enrollees. Because that data's -- we just don't have access to that data at this point.

GREEN: OK. Well, generally, the ACA has led to a huge increase in coverage. Even without the polls, we've seen some of the numbers. And is that, can you verify that, with your companies? Whether it be WellPoint, Blue Cross? Have you seen that increase in the number of people who've signed up with your companies since the deadline?

RODGERS: Speaking for Healthcare Service Corporation, I've provided in my written testimony as well as in my opening comments, the number of people that we signed up on and off exchange during the open enrollment period. I can't tell you today how many of those came from the ranks of the uninsured, or from our competitors or either from a prior policy with one of our five Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans, but we're certainly happy to have the numbers up.

GREEN: OK. Well, and we understand the -- there were people who were using the -- the websites and the national exchange to shop. And I had some companies who said, "I'm a small business. I -- I encourage--" In fact, I have a (inaudible) in my area, he said, "We have actually helped our employees sign up individually," because, you know, you have 10 employees, they -- they weren't required, but they actually used it, so -- and I know that's an analogy, but I've heard that from a lot of my employers.

Now, I know my republican colleagues with mid-data from these polls, that anything that comes through the administration of the overall signup. In March, Speaker Boehner said that there were less people today with health insurance than there were before this law went into effect.

I think not even basing it on a poll, would you all agree that there are more people in -- have health insurance now, let's say, since May 1? Than we had before the ACA?

RODGERS: I -- I can't speak to numbers on that enrollment.

GREEN: OK.

I don't know how my colleagues continue to make unfounded claims in the face of the clear evidence that Affordable Care Act's providing millions of Americas with, Americans with healthcare coverage. It makes me wonder what -- what possible convince them that millions of Americans have gained coverage under the law. I suspect that ultimately once the information becomes so indisputable it'll -- maybe will change the subject and rather, and concede that clearly more people who have health insurance as a result the ACA.

And having serving many years in Congress and even before that, in the state legislature in Texas, no law of Congress ever passes is perfect. That's not how our forefathers created the system. So we do need to go back like our ranking member said, and see what we can do to fix the ACA. And I appreciate y'all's efforts to help us do that once we get to that point. And I'll yield back my time.

MURPHY: Gentleman yields back. Now recognize Mr. Griffith of Virginia for five minutes.

GRIFFITH: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Thank you all for being here. Miss Blackburn asked you earlier for a show of hands. I'm going to do the same. If your company anticipates a reduction for the average family that you insure of $2500 or more, would you raise your hand? If your company anticipates an -- a reduction in premium of $2,000 per average family, for your subscribers, raise your hand. Same for $1500. All right. I appreciate that.

When will your companies submit their rates to the administration for 2015? Do you all have a date that you're going to do that by? Please start...

PRATT: Believe the...

GRIFFITH: Yes.

PRATT: ... rates are due toward the end of June. I believe it's June 27. I think the -- some of the states are a little bit ahead of that.

GRIFFITH: All right. And do you know when those will become public?

PRATT: Depending on the market, sir, that will vary. Depending on the states.

GRIFFITH: All right. And when you submit those to the administration, will you commit today to submitting those rates to us as well?

RODGERS: I'm not involved in the rate submission process, but to the extent that's possible, I'll need to talk to with our company representatives about that.

GRIFFITH: Well, certainly can't see how it'd be illegal to share information with United States Congress but...

RODGERS: Didn't say illegal.

GRIFFITH: ... if possible, you will do it, Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: I need to confirm with our actuaries who are involved in the rate filing process, because I'm not.

PRATT: We're -- we're happy to work with this committee as -- as long as the rates remain proprietary until they do become public and -- and all of our competitors see it.

GRIFFITH: All right. That's certainly fair. Any others? Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: I'd have to take that under advisement about how we share rates.

GRIFFITH: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: I'd just say the rates are very competitively sensitive, for obvious reasons, so we want to make sure that it's a a level playing field at the time the rates are disclosed.

GRIFFITH: Have either you or anyone in your organizations, and again, it's for all of you all, engaged in discussions with the administration already about the 2015 rates?

(UNKNOWN): Not that I'm aware of.

(UNKNOWN): No. Not to my knowledge.

GRIFFITH: No -- everyone is silent. Does that mean there have been none? Has anybody had any discussions with the administration about rates for 2015?

(UNKNOWN): None that I'm aware of.

GRIFFITH: OK.

(UNKNOWN): No, no.

GRIFFITH: All right. Appreciate that. Thank you very much.

Mr. Pratt, the ACA includes a tax credit for small businesses to purchase health insurance coverage for employees. The law also levies a tax on health insurance purchase by small businesses. On the one hand, we give employers a tax credit to make health insurance more affordable, and then we turn around with the other hand and we tax those policies. Does that not seem as an inherent conflict in policy to you?

PRATT: Congressman, we've expressed significant concerns with the new tax on small businesses and individuals that total some hundred billion dollars that will largely be passed on to them in the form of higher premiums.

GRIFFITH: And -- and what we're trying to do, of course, is to see if we can't keep premiums down and -- and the ACA, Obamacare, has failed to meet its promise of a $2500 reduction for the average family. That's pretty straightforward, isn't it?

PRATT: Congressman, we -- we do believe that the health insurance tax runs counter to the goal of providing more affordable coverage.

GRIFFITH: And as a part of this, we're actually taxing government itself. We've got federal programs, including Medicare Advantage, Medicaid, managed care. Federal government is in fact taxing itself with the tax that you spoke of earlier through its subsidization of Medicare and in part Medicaid, and then state governments are also having to pay the tax. Do you have any idea how much that tax is on the American people? You said a hundred billion in increase, but how much for the federal and state governments?

PRATT: Congressman, I don't have that information handy, but we did commission a study by Oliver Wyman that does break out that information in more detail, including on a state-by-state basis. And we'd be happy to make that available.

GRIFFITH: All right. I appreciate that, if you would. Also, in your testimony, you write that insurers have many duplicate enrollments because of the problems with Healthcare.gov, and I can tell you that we had that in both -- I've heard it from constituents and in our family. Apparently we didn't push the right button the first time around. Say "we." My wife did it all. Don't want to take on any assumptions that it was us doing it. It was my wife working over the computer for hours and hours. But actually submitted several different applications. Ended up with one.

How widespread is that problem for citizens out there, and is that part of the confusion between whether or not people have paid their premiums or not?

PRATT: Congressman, the challenge you referred to, I think, was presented as a result of the -- the problems with the website and the technology and anecdotally we have heard from our members about a number of duplicate enrollments. Don't have an order of magnitude on that other than to know that it has been a -- a problem, and an issue.

GRIFFITH: All right. I appreciate that. Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

MURPHY: Gentleman yields back. Now recognize Miss Schakowsky for five minutes.

SCHAKOWSKY: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. This morning, the democratic committee staff released a memorandum on the amazing number of distortions and false claims that republicans have made about the Affordable Care Act. It's a deplorable record. Virtually every major prediction or claim made by the republicans about the ACA since 2009, turned out to be wrong.

Today we have the benefit of hearing from some of the companies that are actually working on the Affordable Care Act in the real world. These companies were not the biggest supporters of the law. They still oppose many provisions. But they do not live in the Republican echo chamber. They live in the real world, and I hope they can provide some clarity on a few questions.

The first question I have for all of you is whether the ACA is a government takeover of healthcare. Republicans have made that claim I don't know how many times. By one count the phrase appeared on Speaker Boehner's website 90 different places. It's mentioned on the RNC, Republican National Committee website, 200 times. Days before Affordable Care Act's passage in 2010, then-House Minority Leader John Boehner's office wrote that, quote, "Democrats have opted for a government takeover of healthcare."

So Mr. Wingle, the ACA is now in effect. Has the government nationalized Aetna, or is it still a for-profit corporation?

WINGLE: We are a publicly traded, for-profit corporation.

SCHAKOWSKY: And Mr. Evanko, what about you? Has Cigna been taken over by the federal government?

EVANKO: No. We're a for-profit organization.

SCHAKOWSKY: Mr. Rodgers, Mr. Mathias (sic), have your companies been nationalized, or are they still nonprofits?

RODGERS: We're a not-for-profit mutual legal reserve company.

MATHIS: We're actually a for-profit organization.

SCHAKOWSKY: Oh, you're for-profit. Sorry.

Mr. Pratt, you work for the trade group that represents the private insurance industry. Is there still a private insurance industry, or has the industry been destroyed or taken over by the government as republicans predicted?

PRATT: There is still a private industry, and we represent many of those companies.

SCHAKOWSKY: Thank you. Republicans also questioned whether the private health insurance -- whether private health insurance would even exist in 2014. In 2010, Senator Coburn said, quote, "There will be no insurance industry left in three years." And that, quote, "private health insurance will be dead in three years."

I should note that nearly four years have passed since that statement was made. Mr. Pratt, is the private industry, health industry, dead?

PRATT: Representative, no.

SCHAKOWSKY: Does anybody else on the panel believe the private industry has disappeared? Private insurance industry? Thank you.

Republicans have also claimed that Americans will no longer be able to see their doctors because of the ACA. Mr. Wingle, do your, does your company healthcare plan, do the plans cover physician care?

WINGLE: They do.

SCHAKOWSKY: And Mr. Evanko, what about you? Does Cigna have doctors in its healthcare plans?

EVANKO: Yes, we do.

SCHAKOWSKY: Mr. Rodgers, what about HCSC? Do you include doctors in your networks?

RODGERS: Certainly.

SCHAKOWSKY: And Mr. Mathias (sic), what about WellPoint?

MATHIS: Yes. We cover physician services.

SCHAKOWSKY: Thank you. Thank you very much.

Republicans have claimed that nobody would sign up for coverage. They've claimed that huge numbers have not paid for coverage. Eight million people have signed up for coverage on the exchanges. Millions more have coverage outside the exchanges, and each of the insurance companies here today have testified that people have signed up in droves and upwards of 80 or 90 percent have paid their premiums.

Mr. Chairman, I don't know if there will ever come a day when republicans will admit their criticisms of the ACA have been unfounded. I think we may have reached a turning point last week when you released your misleading report on the Affordable Care Act enrollment. I think the American public finally realized that republicans have absolutely no credibility on this issue. You cannot be this wrong this many times and still expect to be taken seriously.

When commentator Ezra Klein even gave the republican behavior a name, Obamacare Derangement Syndrome. He defined it as, and I quote, "the acute inability to see Obamacare as anything but a catastrophic failure that the American people will soon reject. For those suffering from ODS, all bad Obamacare news is good news, and all good Obamacare news is sin. In this world, delays of minor provisions in the law prove that the entire structure is collapsing, while surges of millions of people enrolling in insurance don't prove anything at all."

Mr. Chairman, perhaps we can ask our panel of insurers if their policies cover Obamacare Derangement Syndrome. But really, that's rhetorical, and I yield back. Thank you.

MURPHY: But it would be important to know if that's a preexisting condition, and I think it's not covered (inaudible).

SCHAKOWSKY: It would be covered now. Good news, Mr. Chairman.

(LAUGHTER)

MURPHY: Depends what the death panel says, I think, (inaudible).

Mr. Olson's now recognized for five minutes.

OLSON: I thank the Chair. And welcome to our witnesses. I wish you weren't here. But you are here. You're here because the administration would not give us the information we need to educate our constituents about Obamacare. And the rollout of Healthcare.gov.

I want to talk about, all of you, question about the back end. And the money supposed to be getting from the exchange of the information. In your experiences, is it working? Mr. Pratt, the back end working? You getting what you need? From Healthcare.gov?

PRATT: Representative, throughout the open enrollment period, we worked very closely to develop work-arounds, manual processes and other things that were necessary to make the system work better. It's my understanding that while the back-end problems have improved, some remain.

OLSON: Workarounds. You guys stepped up to plate to work around the disaster of the healthcare exchange rollout. Is that what you're trying to say? I mean, you guys took upon yourself, instead of depending on (inaudible). They gathered information. You're dependent upon them. And it's sort of trickling out and just coming slowly, slowly, slowly.

Not what you need? Is that what you're saying? You guys stepped around to make that happen?

PRATT: Representative, I think what I would say is that we kept the interests of our members squarely in mind in terms of minimizing disruption for them, and our members did what was necessary to make sure that it was as smooth as it possibly could be.

OLSON: Mr. Coyne?

COYNE: I would agree with Mr. Pratt. There are still back-end issued to be worked through, but that we are working with CMS on those. CMS has called a meeting of health insurers in the federal marketplace on May 20, to consider some of those back-end issues and try and find solutions to them.

OLSON: I hope you keep up abroad what they, that meeting, puts out, puts forth. Give us that information. Because we're not getting it from the Obama administration. Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: We've worked closely to share our concerns about technical needs and help work with the industry, our trade, through our trade association, with colleagues, to recommend and -- recommend prioritization on fixes for back-end issues, whether they're data cleanup issues or other issues related to the back end of the exchange.

OLSON: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: There are certainly more manual processes than we anticipated prior to the exchanges launching. I'd say there have been improvements in some areas. The one back-end issue that we're move focused on is the APTC payments coming from CMS to our -- our -- us as a carrier. That's a manual process today. We have been getting the payments we've been requesting though, as it relates to APTC.

OLSON: Manual process. Twenty-first Century manual process. Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: We're continuing to work with the enrollment process to make sure that any of the members that have selected one of our five Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans get the information they need from us and ultimately the care they need.

OLSON: Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: Yes. We're -- we've seen significant improvement, but we still have a number of opportunities for improvement as we move through the remainder of this year.

OLSON: And one final question for all the panelists. Is the website fixed? Mr. Pratt? If it's not fixed, when will it be fixed?

PRATT: Representative, I don't work in the operations area. I think if the back-end issues are considered part of the website, I would suggest...

OLSON: They are.

PRATT: ... that there are -- there are still issues outstanding that we're working on.

OLSON: Not fixed. Mr. Coyne?

COYNE: There are still issues on the back end...

(CROSSTALK)

OLSON: Another one not fixed. Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: There's still work to be done.

OLSON: Not fixed. Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: I can't comment on the end-to-end process. I can only comment on the component when CMS sends us enrollment transactions. And there's still work to do before that's 100 percent.

OLSON: Not fixed. Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Yes. We're still working with the files that we get, and I think there could be some improvement.

OLSON: Still not fixed. Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: Yes. To echo my colleagues' statements, we still have opportunities for improvement.

OLSON: Six for six. All not fixed. Mr. Chairman, I yield back. That's my time.

CHAIRMAN: Now recognize Mr. Tonko for five minutes.

TONKO: Thank you, Mr. Chair. So much of the debate we have with our Republican colleagues about the Affordable Care Act comes down to one simple question. Is it a good thing for Americans to have access to quality health insurance?

You would think this is a simple question. Every Republican member of the committee has health insurance. I bet that every pundit who makes a living attacking the ACA has health insurance. They all make certain their children have health insurance. I bet they wouldn't dream of going without it for an extended period of time.

Two big reasons these people make sure they have coverage is that it can help them stay healthy, and it can prevent catastrophic medical bills that can lead to financial ruin. But this week we got clear evidence from Massachusetts that health insurance actually saves lives. Researchers at the Harvard School of Public Health looked at mortality rates in Massachusetts and in surrounding states.

My question, Mr. Pratt, is that in 2006, Massachusetts passed major health reform legislation. Is that not correct?

PRATT: Yes, that's correct.

TONKO: And did that coverage expansion bear some significant similarities to the Affordable Care Act, including an individual mandate, expanded Medicaid coverage, and insurance exchanges?

PRATT: Generally, I would say that's fair to say.

TONKO: Thank you. The Harvard researchers found that following healthcare reform in Massachusetts, mortality rates dropped significantly compared to surrounding states. The death rate from treatable illnesses, like cancer and heart disease, declined even faster. These findings are truly remarkable, nearly a 5 percent drop in mortality from preventable illnesses. They found that for every 830 individuals who gained coverage, one life was saved.

Extrapolating that onto the national scene, if the trend holds, it means that ACA will save tens of thousands of lives. I'm not going to ask the witnesses to comment on the specifics of that study. But these witnesses know the value that health insurance provides.

Mr. MATHIS, do you have any doubt that your health insurance plans cover lifesaving treatments?

MATHIS: No, they do, sir.

TONKO: Mr. Evanko, what about you? Do you help members access lifesaving treatments?

EVANKO: Absolutely.

TONKO: Thank you. And, Mr. RODGERS, Mr. Wingle, what about your plans?

RODGERS: At the healthcare company, we are proud of providing consumers with high-quality plans, competitively priced. We're very proud of that.

WINGLE: Yes, sir. I agree.

TONKO: Thank you for your affirmative answers. Thank you. I think Republicans are really outside of the mainstream when they try to argue that Americans aren't better off if they have health insurance coverage. Their tireless efforts to discourage people from getting covered are truly shameful. Even more shameful is the refusal of Republican governors and some legislatures to expand the Medicaid program. Doing that would provide millions of Americans with healthcare coverage. And the Harvard study indicates that doing so would save thousands of lives. So we thank you for your affirmative answers.

(UNKNOWN): (Inaudible) back now, recognize Mr. Gardner for five minutes.

GARDNER: Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you to the witnesses for being here today, and your time. Last year, the president apologized for his broken promise -- if you like your plan, you can keep your plan -- after millions of Americans received plan cancellations. I'd like each insurer to reply in turn, how many plans did you cancel or discontinue last year because of Obamacare?

Mr. Coyne?

COYNE: We don't have that information at the association. Individual health plans have that information.

GARDNER: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: We can provide that information to the committee.

GARDNER: Could you submit that for the record and by state what the total, for all of you?

Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: Sure. It's...

GARDNER: Do you have the number off the top of your head right now?

EVANKO: I can give you approximations...

(CROSSTALK)

GARDNER: Sure. That'd be great.

EVANKO: We had approximately 2,000 customers -- individual customers in South Carolina and Connecticut.

GARDNER: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: Again, we want to get you the -- the firm data.

GARDNER: Okay. Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: I don't have that data with me. I think we provided it to other congressional committees, so we certainly can...

GARDNER: But that's not a number that you keep on the top of your head?

RODGERS: Not at all.

GARDNER: Okay. Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: I don't have the number of products off the top of my head, but we'd be happy to provide that...

GARDNER: If you could submit for the record, by state and with the total, I would appreciate it. Then -- hey, does your organization know how many planned cancellations there were nationwide last year or -- or for your members?

MATHIS: Congressman, we would not have that information.

GARDNER: You're -- you don't ask that of your members? They don't provide that to you?

MATHIS: To my knowledge, we do not, no.

GARDNER: And, Mr. Coyne, does your organization know how many member plans were cancelled? You don't?

COYNE: We haven't asked for that information either.

GARDNER: In order to avoid these cancellations, some insurers offered early renewal plans, so they could continue into 2014. If each of the insurers could reply in turn, how many plans did you offer early renewals, too, last year that would have been otherwise cancelled?

Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: We -- we offered early renewals to all of our customers in all 14 states. That was allowable. So California did not allow us to offer early renewal. But in the majority of every other market, we offered it to every customer.

GARDNER: Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: We offered early renewals in four of our five states, the Montana Plan became part of our larger...

GARDNER: And how many -- how many were the -- were those offers? How many offers were there?

RODGERS: I don't have the number with me, but they're significant numbers, yes. And...

GARDNER: Did you provide -- all of you provide those for the record and by state, breaking it down, please?

Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: Yes. We offered early renewals to about 235,000 customers in all states, except for Connecticut and South Carolina, as I testified earlier.

GARDNER: Okay.

And, Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: We offered early renewals as consistent with state laws and regulations.

GARDNER: Okay. Last year, president apologized -- President Obama apologized for these cancelled plans and offered a one-year delay of enforcing the Obamacare requirements that led to the cancellations. This delay has since been extended.

I'd like each insurer to answer, how many plans do you currently offer that do not meet the law's requirements but you are able to continue offering because of this delay?

Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: I would have to get you that number, sir. I don't know it off the top of my head.

GARDNER: Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Yeah. I don't know the number.

GARDNER: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: I don't know the exact figure either.

GARDNER: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: I don't have the hard numbers on the pre-ACA plans.

GARDNER: To AHIP, do you know how many plans your member organizations currently offer under this delay?

PRATT: Could you please repeat that question (inaudible)?

GARDNER: The question is the one-year delay of enforcing Obamacare requirements that led to the cancellation, this delay has been extended. How many plans do you currently offer that do not meet the law's requirements but you're able to continue offering because of this delay?

(CROSSTALK)

PRATT: We don't have that information.

GARDNER: ...number.

Mr. Coyne?

COYNE: The only information we have has been informally reported to us. And it contains all non-ACA compliant plans across the Blue system, and that number is 3.2 million.

GARDNER: Mr. Mathis, what happens when those plans -- when the time runs out, when the delay expires?

MATHIS: So it -- depending on how the state handles it, with the extension, in theory, a customer could sign up for two more years.

GARDNER: What happens after that time expires, cancelled?

MATHIS: Then they would be new to an ACA product.

GARDNER: So that plan would be cancelled?

MATHIS: Yes, sir.

GARDNER: Mr. Rodgers, would that plan be cancelled at the end of the time period?

RODGERS: Mr. Matheson's (sic) characterization was correct. I believe...

GARDNER: So, yes, that's a cancellation after the time expires.

Mr. Evanko, would those plans be cancelled after the time expired?

EVANKO: Based on the current guidance, yes.

GARDNER: Mr. Wingle, would those plans be cancelled after the time expires?

WINGLE: Where -- where feasible, we would offer the member an ACA-compliant alternative.

GARDNER: Could you submit the total numbers for all those plans that would be cancelled when the time expires? Break it down by state, please. Thank you.

And one of the excuses that we've heard from the -- the supporters of the healthcare bill is that the law didn't do this, didn't cause the cancellations, that you were the ones who planned the cancellations and planned all of the cancellations. Were the massive cancellation notices sent last year the ones the president apologized for? Were these because of Obamacare or because of you?

Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: The law required us to send out those cancellations.

GARDNER: So Obamacare required the cancellations.

Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: The law required us to, in certain situations...

(CROSSTALK)

GARDNER: So Obamacare caused and required the cancellation.

Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: We had such a small fraction of our book of business that was not offered early renewals, but that was...

GARDNER: So -- but Obamacare required the 2,000 cancellations that you said?

EVANKO: In the two states where we did not offer early renewals.

GARDNER: Mr. Wingle, did Obamacare cause the cancellations?

WINGLE: Plans that weren't compliant with the benefit requirements of the law were cancelled.

GARDNER: So that's a yes?

WINGLE: That is a yes.

GARDNER: In attempting to pass this law, the president said repeatedly, "If you like your plan, you can keep it." Did that turn out to be true for all of your customers?

Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: No. That was not true for 100 percent of our customers.

GARDNER: Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Not for 100 percent.

GARDNER: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: For over 99 percent of our customers, that was the case.

GARDNER: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: Not in all cases, no.

(CROSSTALK)

GARDNER: ...your time, and I yield back.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you. Now, recognize Miss Castor for five minutes.

CASTOR: Well, thank you very much. And good morning. And thank you, Mr. Chairman, for calling this hearing to discuss the strong enrollment numbers of the Affordable Care Act.

When the enrollment numbers were released last week, coming from the state of Florida, we were floored. About 1 million Floridians signed up under the Affordable Care Act. This far exceeded our expectations. We thought 600,000, 700,000, but to get to about a million signed up, that doesn't include the about 300,000 children that signed up under children's health insurance, or our disabled neighbors, or children under Medicaid.

And then I learned from our Florida Blue executives Friday, Florida Blue's the market leader in Florida that -- that million- dollar figure does not include others that signed up for -- with private health insurance companies. So that's -- add on another probably couple hundred thousand. It's really remarkable, and it has far exceeded our expectations.

Now, I really -- you know, I just think about all of my neighbors all across the state that are breathing easier because now they have financial security in their lives that they did not have before. And I want to thank all of our navigators, the insurance brokers, many of the insurance companies that were out providing information, all of our community outreach partners. You have made a fundamental difference in the lives of -- of millions of Floridians. And it's -- it's going to be very meaningful for them and their families.

It's also good news for neighbors that have insurance already. Most people across America already have insurance. And if you have insurance, what you want most of all is that you want other people to have insurance because the -- the cost of these high premium increases and rates -- rate increases over time were largely caused by this huge uninsured population. And those costs, when they show up at the hospital for healthcare, they have to be paid somewhere. So that's what we're hoping then.

And we've heard time and time again of some -- the scare tactics here. And we will -- we'll see what happens with premium increases. But do we want to go back to the double-digit consistent premium increases of the past? I don't think so. So this is a way that hopefully, over time, we will be able to stabilize the marketplace.

And I think my -- my colleague Congressman Tonko was right. I think my Republican friends now are in danger of sounding like they are opposed to people taking personal responsibility and having health insurance. People need to have health insurance to maintain their quality of life, to -- to make sure they don't go bankrupt. And I would hope that my Republican friends could now turn the page and we could get to work on many of the complicated issues with health policy in America.

Now, one of the -- my Republican colleagues, if they were to tax on healthcare reform, is that it will cause people to lose their doctors. Now, you have to say, okay, even in Florida, where you have over a million people now that now have health insurance, they're going to be able to see a doctor, 8 million nationwide. But this is especially bizarre coming from Republicans because they have long opposed any policy proposals to broaden networks. They have fought efforts to increase reimbursement for primary care providers who serve Medicare and Medicaid patients.

What has been lost in this debate is the fact that the ACA sets important new network adequacy standards that guarantee access to key essential community providers. It ensures that no consumer will ever see a huge out-of-network bill if they're taken to an emergency room. And it gives consumers strong appeal rights. It's a huge step forward in patient access.

Mr. Pratt, can you give us some context here? Providers and insurance regularly negotiate rates and determine who will -- inside of a network. Isn't that correct?

PRATT: Representative, yes, that's correct.

CASTOR: And if insurers had to include every provider in their network, wouldn't that eliminate their bargaining power and substantially increase premiums?

PRATT: Congresswoman, I think that is generally correct. I wouldn't characterize the amount of the increase. But it is a very important aspect of keeping premiums affordable.

CASTOR: Okay. Can these high-value networks improve care coordination and move us towards a system where we pay for quality rather than quantity in our healthcare system?

PRATT: Absolutely. Our members are working very hard toward that end.

CASTOR: See, I think this network adequacy is a -- in the marketplace is an important issue. We need to make sure that consumers have access to providers in their area and that they have enough choices to get the care they need when they need it. Republicans should not attack the ACA for letting the private market work.

And remember personal responsibility is fundamental. It's a fundamental tenet of the Affordable Care Act. And it's often times the customers' responsibility to review all of the choices they have, whether it's Bronze, Silver, Gold, Platinum and the networks contained therein and make their own choice. So the law sets key new standards and provides important protections but insurers and providers will continue to negotiate to ensure sufficient access at fair prices.

Thank you very much. I yield back.

(UNKNOWN): (Inaudible) yields back. Chair recognizes gentleman from Ohio. Mr. Johnson, five minutes for your questions, please.

JOHNSON: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Wow. So much to -- to talk about, so little time to -- to talk about it all. Gentlemen, thank you for joining us today. You know, one of the reasons this committee is requested -- has requested this information from you is because the administration has refused repeatedly to provide any data on who is actually paying for the Affordable Care Act.

In fact, one White House spokesman told reporters to ask your industry for this information. Do you -- so here's the question for you. Do you currently provide any information to the administration on who has paid for their plan? If yes, what information do you provide and -- and how is it provided and how often? It -- do -- do you provide any information to the administration?

WINGLE: The only information we provide around -- around payment is related to the invoicing we do with the government to get the premium tax credit.

JOHNSON: And how is it provided and how often?

WINGLE: It's the process we described earlier. It's a -- it's a workaround process because the financial management module is not fully constructed on the FFM (inaudible)...

(CROSSTALK)

JOHNSON: Who do you send it to, Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: Send it to CMS.

JOHNSON: Okay. Well, for -- it's -- it's a little confusing. So the administration will pay your industry a subsidy for potential customers who never even effectuate their enrollment. So if you're not providing the details to the administration on who's paying for the Affordable Care Act, how are they paying you? How are they -- what -- what are they basing their payments to you on?

WINGLE: I'd only make one clarification. We do not submit information for payment from the government for member who are not effectuated, who haven't made their own portion of the binder payment. We do not do that.

JOHNSON: What -- let me -- let me dig a little deeper then. So how do you get paid? How do you get paid? And what is that based on? What information do you provide the government, the administration, that gets you paid?

WINGLE: The -- the process essentially works because we have the enrollment file information. We understand the premium for the plan selected by the consumer on that enrollment file.

JOHNSON: So you're paid based on enrollment, not on actual payment?

WINGLE: Yeah. We understand the member's responsibility on that enrollment, and the difference between the premium rate and the member responsibility tells us what the government is -- and we roll that figure up monthly.

JOHNSON: So if you only submit for effectuated -- it -- I can't even pronounce that word. Doesn't the administration know the pay rate? Don't they know how much these people are -- are -- are paying?

MATHIS: Yes, sir. They -- they've determined the subsidy eligibility as part of the enrollment process. And so a file would come to us. We'd bill for the member responsibility. Upon collection of that member responsibility, then we would -- typically, if the system were working as designed, we would send a file to the government, to the exchange, saying, "Here are the members that have effectuated enrollment, and here's ultimately the payment that is back due to us."

JOHNSON: So do you believe the administration is currently able to report the payment rate or who is fully enrolled? Do you think they have that information, based on what you give them?

MATHIS: So, to date, the payments that are coming back and forth are estimated. So there's not been a direct reconciliation between our company and the exchange on a member by member basis.

That's one of the works in progress that we discussed on the backend discussion we had earlier in the day, sir.

JOHNSON: Considering then that the administration is able to report who selects a plan on healthcare.gov, would it be possible for them to gather information on who has actually paid for a plan? Let's start down with Mr. Pratt.

PRATT: Representative, it's my understanding that that capability is not present yet...

JOHNSON: Mr. Coyne?

PRATT: ...whether it may be in the future.

JOHNSON: Okay.

COYNE: Yeah. It's -- it's my understanding as well that that capability isn't ready yet.

JOHNSON: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: I don't know what the administration can infer from the data they have. But I know the financial management module itself is not available.

JOHNSON: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: One bit of color I'll add to my colleagues is the submission for APTC is only for those that are APTC eligible. So there's also people that do not qualify for that. That should be in that calculation.

JOHNSON: Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Yes. I think my -- my colleagues are correct in the -- in their statements. And we're still working on the reconciliation process for payment.

JOHNSON: Okay.

Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: I would concur with what was (inaudible).

JOHNSON: Final question. Does the administration know who's paid for their plan?

Mr. Pratt?

PRATT: Congressman, I don't know the answer to that question.

JOHNSON: Mr. Coyne?

COYNE: I don't know either.

WINGLE: I don't know what the administration knows about the enrollment, in terms of who's paid.

EVANKO: I don't know either.

RODGERS: No, sir.

MATHIS: No, sir.

JOHNSON: It's interesting that they sent us to ask you folks. Okay. Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

(UNKNOWN): Gentleman yields back his time. Chair recognizes gentleman from Kentucky. Mr. Yarmuth, you have five minutes for your questions, please.

YARMUTH: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. And I'm really glad we had this hearing. That's something I usually don't say very often. But this has been a very illuminating hearing because I think what it's done very clearly is to show what our colleagues on the other side's strategy is, which is to try and hold a hearing in which they can grab a headline that will, in some way, scare the American people about what's -- about the Affordable Care Act rather than providing true information about what's going on.

And, you know, it's -- it's clear from the desperation. Once their initial strategy of trying to deal with this alleged failure to pay premiums -- now they've moved on to try and scare people about what premiums might increase by later, either next year or in the future. So, you know -- I -- and I'm glad you all stressed how important is was that you not give up your competitive position because, obviously, you're all competing in markets.

And, you know, I could turn that strategy around and do the same thing and ask you speculative questions like, will the premium increases that we are likely to see approach the 38 percent that we saw -- we were seeing in 2010 before the Affordable Care Act was passed? And -- and I'll ask you to speculate on that. But I won't do that. And I -- I could ask you about what the rate of cancellations of policies were prior to the -- the Affordable Care Act.

And I could also ask you -- and I think this would be a fair question. I wouldn't expect you to answer. How many of your insurance companies, because of the success of the Affordable Care Act enrollment so far and the -- the beneficial mix of younger people has prompted you to explore doing business in other states, as has been reported in the media? I think that would be a question that I would love to have the answer to.

I know, for instance, in Kentucky, the -- the co-op -- the non- profit Kentucky co-op, which is competing in the exchange, is now getting ready to do business in West Virginia because they don't have a co-op, and they see an opportunity there. And I think the main co- op is planning to do business in (inaudible) Massachusetts co-op in Maine because they see an opportunity there.

So I think all these things are indications that the Affordable Care Act, far from being the train wreck which many have suggested it would become, is actually getting a lot deal of traction as it -- it speeds down the -- the tracks. And just to put it in perspective, in Kentucky, we have -- we have insured, in the period of six months, roughly half of the previously uninsured population of the state. We -- 411,000 people now have coverage in Kentucky under the ACA. Three- quarters of those -- in answer to one of the questions that was asked earlier, three-quarters of those we know previously had no insurance. And 52 percent of all that 411,000 people are under 35.

So we know things are in -- working in Kentucky, and, as Ms. Castor mentioned, things are surprisingly successful in Florida despite an administration there which has done everything it could to sabotage the -- the Affordable Care Act. So, you know, I -- one that we can speculate about and argue about as a level of success, whether it's success or a train wreck, you know, the markets certainly have had something to say about how they view the Affordable Care Act in terms of your businesses.

I look at those share prices of the companies represented here, and one based in my own state -- Humana's based in my district. When the Affordable Care Act was enacted, their stock price was 44. Now it's 110. Aetna's was 33. Now it's 72. United Healthcare was 27. Now it's 75. And Cigna's was 34, and now it's 83, roughly. So the market has made a judgment, I think, about the fact that, at least in terms of your business, the Affordable Care Act has offered a significant financial benefit.

So I think this -- again, this is -- one of the things that's fascinating about this hearing is we know what the Republicans have tried to do, and that's to scare the American people and to use every little indication of a problem that -- to reflect a -- some kind of a doomsday scenario that we are looking at. And, fortunately, the facts on the ground, whether it's the marketplace, whether it's the experience in Kentucky or Florida or California, where literally millions of people -- by one estimate, 20.8 million people -- got coverage under the ACA, or bought coverage because of the ACA in the private markets outside the exchanges, we are doing exactly what we intended it to do.

We know there have been glitches. We know there have been problems. Any undertaking of this magnitude would experience those. But, again, I thank you for your participation, and I thank you for this hearing. And I yield back.

(UNKNOWN): Gentleman from New Mexico is recognized for five minutes, Mr. Lujan, for your questions, please.

LUJAN: Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Mathis, your company CEO said last week that the surge in enrollment in March included a higher percentage of young people than in earlier months. Isn't that correct?

MATHIS: That is correct, sir.

LUJAN: And, Mr. Evanko, your CEO said something similar last week as well. Isn't that correct?

EVANKO: That's correct.

LUJAN: And as a general matter, all else being equal, a higher percentage of young people in the risk pool will help lower premiums. Isn't that correct?

Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: That's a complicated question. It's an important one. But it's a complicated question.

LUJAN: I think that all that we've heard and from all the actuaries is that the answer is yes. We need more young people in. It lowers premiums.

Mr. Pratt, insurance company premiums are market sensitive information that companies are not eager to let their competitors know until the last minute. Isn't that correct?

PRATT: Representative, it is competitively sensitive information. I don't know that I could speak to their particular perspective on that question.

LUJAN: Well, it seems like they'd want to keep it to themselves as long as they're able to so that competitors aren't able to get their hands on it and adjust accordingly. Is that correct? Is that fair?

PRATT: It's fair to say it's competitively sensitive information.

LUJAN: And is it correct that many insurance commissioners around the country have the authority to review rates and that the final rates consumers pay are sometimes lower than the rates that are actually filed?

PRATT: Yes, Representative. Typically speaking, rates are filed with the states, and the states review those rates.

LUJAN: Very good. I -- I used to sit on a regulatory body that the superintendent of insurance was under our jurisdiction, so I appreciate the answer to that because I know what we saw when I was there as well, sir. So I'd certainly agree with that. Is it also true that the ACA contains a series of policies, re-insurance, risk adjustment, and risk corridors to help mitigate potential premium increases?

PRATT: Congressman, one goal of the three Rs program -- the so- called three Rs program is to stabilize premiums in the early years of implementation.

LUJAN: And a final question to the panelists. Before the ACA, wasn't it common for insurance premiums to increase significant year to year, often by double digits? Anyone? Is there anyone that would disagree that premiums increased by more than 50 percent between 2003 and 2010? Hearing none, I guess the answer to that is there's agreement.

The 8 million figure only includes people who have signed up for insurance directly through the federal and state marketplaces that my colleagues are trying to dismiss. But people can also sign up for private ACA-compliant plans outside of the marketplaces. We don't have a lot of conversation about that.

Mr. Pratt, are individuals able to enroll in some of the plans that AHIP represents outside of the federal and state marketplaces?

PRATT: That's correct.

LUJAN: The CBO estimates that 5 million people will purchase ACA-compliant plans outside of the marketplace this year. These individuals will obtain the same protections and be a part of the same risk pools in each state as those who enrolled via the marketplaces.

Mr. Rodgers, how many of HSCS's (sic) enrollments have outside been -- have been outside of the marketplace?

RODGERS: As I said in my opening testimony, it was provided in written form to the committee. I believe we had about 230,000 off- exchange applications during the open enrollment period ending April 15.

LUJAN: And about how many applicants have you received overall?

RODGERS: We've received overall about 830,000 applications across our five states.

LUJAN: So that sounds like it's representing about 1.2 million covered lives. So about 28 percent of your enrollees signed up outside of the marketplaces. That's a significant number. And I understand that payment date is not complete. But in the earlier months of this year, what percentage of individuals enrolling in plans outside of the marketplace have paid?

RODGERS: In my written comments to the committee, I shared with you the on-exchange and off-exchange payment rates because there is some difference. Typically, the payment completion rates are a little bit higher off-exchange versus -- versus on-exchange, and you should have that data.

LUJAN: So what -- from what I was able to get from your testimony was that between January and April, 90 to 93 percent, and in May, 63 percent today. And we can verify that in the -- and there's -- that sound accurate, though?

RODGERS: That's correct. That's in my written comments.

LUJAN: Can any of our other witnesses provide us with information on how many off-exchange enrollments they have had to date?

If not, if you -- Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: We have approximately 40,000 off-exchange ACA enrollments. That's about one-third of our total ACA-compliant book.

LUJAN: And what I'd like to do is ask our witnesses if they'd be willing to provide the committee with detailed information on their off-exchange enrollments. Would that be okay with everyone?

RODGERS: Yes.

LUJAN: Very good. I appreciate that. And, you know, later on today, we're going to be having some other hearings in other areas. Despite the demonization and demagoguing of the Affordable Care Act, over 8 million enrollees. Can you imagine what it would have been if Democrats and Republicans would have worked together to fix issues that needed fixing but were able to get more people covered? Who knows where that number would have been.

But later on today, we're going to be having a hearing on taking away someone's Fifth Amendment rights. We have my colleagues that are still refusing to release 39 interview transcripts on an IRS hearing. There is going to be other hearings -- another request on a hearing with Benghazi, even though there's been seven other hearings, 50 repeal attempts on the Affordable Care Act -- think there's a lot of important pressing business that we as the Congress need to get our hands around.

And I'm certainly hopeful that -- in the history and tradition of this committee, with all that I've learned from our senior members, there once upon a time was an effort for us to work together and get along. I certainly hope that those days return. Every time I'm home, that's what we here.

So of all the witnesses that are here today, thank you so much. Chairman, again, for you being here as well and the hearing being brought together today, an important conversation. I hope that we're able to bring more facts into the debate. Thank you very much.

(UNKNOWN): Now his time has expired. The Chair recognizes the ranking members to get -- or follow up.

DEGETTE: Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to follow up on Mr. Lujan's questioning with the off-exchange enrollments because, as we've learned, there have been a number of off-exchange enrollments as -- in addition to the enrollments in the ACA in the -- both in the federal exchange, in the state exchanges.

So I would ask unanimous consent. The committee has made a request of the -- of 160 plans, including plans from this panel here, that they provide information about enrollment figures and premium payments for -- for those plans that are under the Affordable Care Act, the exchanges.

I would ask also if we would ask those same plans for that same information on the off-exchange enrollment, similar to the -- to the data that we got from Blue Cross Blue Shield. Be helpful to know how many off-exchange enrollments we've had from these 160 plans and -- and what the premium payments have been. So I'd ask unanimous consent, that we also ask for that information.

MURPHY: The gentlelady yields back right now. Myself for follow-up. And I would just say, on the off enrollment, I'm one of those members. I actually had both Blue Cross Blue Shield in healthcare.gov on hold. Well, they had me on hold on December 23 and December 24. And it was kind of a race to see who would have a live person answer the phone first. I think, if I recall correctly, Blue Cross won out that day. So I was probably an off-exchange enrollment. So you may count me as that.

Just like to ask each of you in follow-up, many of the products you are offering are only affordable because the government subsidizes part of the premium cost. Do you know what percentage of the plans with paid premiums and effectuated enrollment received some form of subsidy from a taxpayer?

Mr. Coyne, I'll start with you, and then we just go down the line.

COYNE: We don't have that information at this point.

MURPHY: Would you provide it for the record?

COYNE: Yes, we'd be happy to when we get it.

MURPHY: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: Our experience probably comports with generally available published information on that. It's -- it's a majority of our membership.

MURPHY: And, again, can I ask you to submit that for the record?

Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: For on-exchange customers, 80 to 85 percent are eligible for APTC.

MURPHY: Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Yes. I believe we submitted that information, if I understood your question, in the two submissions for April. And with the May 20th submission, we'll provide something similar.

(UNKNOWN): As did we.

MURPHY: Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: Yes. As you know, that number is a moving target. But it is around 79 percent for us.

MURPHY: And would you do your best to -- to give us an accurate representation for the -- for the record. What about a situation where an individual enrolls but then cancels their plan? Are you only paid the subsidy monthly? Or would you be responsible for turning a portion of the subsidy throughout the year?

Mr. Coyne, we'll start with you.

COYNE: No. We don't have that information.

MURPHY: And will you submit that for the record?

COYNE: Yes.

MURPHY: Please try to find that for us.

Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: Could you repeat the question, please, Mr. Chairman?

MURPHY: A situation where an individual enrolls but then cancels their plan, are you only paid the subsidy monthly? Or would you be responsible for returning the portion throughout the year?

WINGLE: Returning the portion of premium paid or...

MURPHY: The -- the Advanced Premium Tax Credit.

WINGLE: Oh, the subsidy. The subsidy, you know, under the three-month grace period rules, we retain until cancellation.

MURPHY: So you would not be required to return that?

WINGLE: No, not until members cancel.

MURPHY: If the member just simply doesn't pay -- they make their first payment, made their second payment, and then they stop. At the end of that three-month grace period, do you have to return the money for those months where they didn't -- the patient didn't pay?

WINGLE: In compliance with the three-month grace period rules, we retain any premium tax credit received during the period to cover -- help us cover or to -- any claims experience we had during the time the member (inaudible).

MURPHY: So you retain the Advanced Premium Tax...

(CROSSTALK)

WINGLE: According with the design of the rules, yes.

MURPHY: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: Well, at -- at the end of the 90-day grace period, if the individual has not paid any more premiums, then we owe that money back to CMS, and we credit that in the next month's reconciliation process.

MURPHY: Interesting.

Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Yeah. I'm not familiar with that particular aspect of the grace period payments in terms of -- of the return or not. But in my -- I believe that we're only entitled to the money that's -- for the -- the time the policy's in effect.

MURPHY: And Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: That's my understanding as well, sir.

MURPHY: Mr. Coyne, do you know -- do you know how much your company has been paid in Advanced Premium Tax Credits?

COYNE: Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association does not actually sponsor any of the products that are on the exchanges. Our member plans do. So we wouldn't be paid premiums or APTC.

MURPHY: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: We received four payments so far for the months of January through April. And it's in the range of 30 to $40 million.

MURPHY: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: We obviously have that data. We can supply the committee with that data.

MURPHY: And that should be -- free to submit that for the record.

Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: We received some payments. I don't know the value of the payments to date.

MURPHY: And will you find that information and submit it for the record, please?

RODGERS: Certainly.

MURPHY: And Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: Yes. I don't have that number ready today, but we'd be happy to get it for you.

MURPHY: The metal plans, you're all familiar with them? Keep hearing about a Copper Plan that's going to be offered. Are any of you familiar with that? Are you -- be offering Copper Plans?

Mr. Coyne?

COYNE: I'm not familiar with that at this point.

MURPHY: Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: Under the current rules for essential health benefits and the rules for qualified health plans, we're not currently authorized to offer anything at the so-called Copper level. Our plan benefits start at Bronze, unless somebody qualifies for catastrophic care. And that's of the lowest actuarial value we're allowed to offer presently.

MURPHY: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: In the event that Copper Plans were introduced as something that's allowed, we would certainly consider it. Cigna believes in choice as one of our core principles for our customers.

MURPHY: Thank you.

Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Currently, we're not approved to offer the Copper Plans. That's certainly something that we believe that members need more cost-effective programs. So if those are offered, I expect that we would...

(CROSSTALK)

MURPHY: Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: My comments will be similar to my colleagues, sir.

MURPHY: Let me just ask each of you, what is your payment rate for products in the large group market?

Starting with you, Mr. Coyne, what are your payments for products in large group market?

COYNE: Individual group plans have that information rather than the association.

MURPHY: See.

Mr. Wingle?

WINGLE: I carry no responsibility for large group. I'd have to get back to you on that.

MURPHY: Mr. Evanko?

EVANKO: I'm not familiar with the large group payment rates either. I'm sorry.

MURPHY: Your company, though, is -- I mean, you're -- you're in the large group market.

EVANKO: We are, sir, yes.

MURPHY: Will you get that information for us? Thank you.

Mr. Rodgers?

RODGERS: Yeah. I don't have that information with me.

MURPHY: But you will provide it for the committee?

RODGERS: Certainly.

MURPHY: And Mr. Mathis?

MATHIS: I'm not sure I understand the question. Could you clarify it for me, please?

MURPHY: Well, the question was, what are your payment rates for products in the large group market?

MATHIS: So is that what our average premium is or...

MURPHY: Your -- how many people pay.

MATHIS: I'm sorry, sir. I'm still not following the question.

MURPHY: Well, what we've generally been talking about today is how many people -- what percentage of people have -- have paid. So can -- following along with that theme...

(CROSSTALK)

MATHIS: I'm sorry. I was a little slow on the uptake there. Typically, we would experience somewhere around a 98 to 97 percent premium payment in -- in the group -- in the large group market.

MURPHY: Very well. Thank you all for your attendance today. Ask (inaudible) consent that members' written opening statements be introduced into the record. Without objection, the documents will be entered into the record. In conclusion, I'd like to thank all the witnesses and the members that participated in today's hearing. I'd like to thank everyone who stuck with us to the end, although that would be the witnesses. I remind members they have 10 business days to submit questions for the record. And I ask the witnesses to all agree to respond promptly to the questions. The committee now stands in adjournment.

REPRESENTATIVE TIMOTHY MURPHY (R-PA): Good morning. I now convene this hearing to examine the implementation of the Affordable Care Act and enrollment of the state and federal exchanges here in the Oversight and Investigation Committee for the Committee on Energy and Commerce. This subcommittee has a long history of trying to get straight answers from the administration on the status of the Affordable Care Act.

Two weeks before the launch of healthcare.gov, the administration official responsible for the implementation of the ACA exchanges told this committee that the Web site would be ready, consumers would be able to go online, shop for, select a plan and then enroll in coverage. When the federal exchange opened on October 1, consumers instead found a crashing Web site. The administration excuse for why the Web site didn't work: volume.

Through this committee's investigation we learned that the administration spent over half a billion dollars on a Web site that they had been warned for several months would not be ready and would not work, a fact that administration officials did not disclose when questioned by this committee during oversight hearings through 2013.

Just after the failed launch we asked the administration on October 8th to provide enrollment data for the first week of healthcare.gov debacle. The administration ignored us. Why?

It wasn't because the data didn't exist. It was because the news wasn't good. When Secretary Sebelius testified before the full Energy and Commerce Committee on October 30th of last year, was asked about enrollment, she stated that she could not provide any data because the administration did not, quote, have any reliable data around enrollment, unquote.

The very next day it was reported that there were only six successful enrollments on October 1st. We tried again during a hearing in January before this subcommittee when we asked the head of the office running the exchanges if the administration collected any data on who has paid their health coverage. This administration official told us that they did not collect this information, quote, but we will be, unquote, as soon as it was finished building the Web site.

While the administration refused to provide straightforward answers to our questions on enrollment, it continues to tout enrollment figures that included individuals who had merely selected a plan online. When pressed by reporters for information on the number of enrollees who had paid their premiums, a White House spokesman said that questions about payment, quote, can best be directed to those private insurance companies that are collecting those payments, unquote.

After months of an administration that refused to be transparent about enrollment, that's what we did. We did exactly what the administration suggested we do. On March 13th we sent a request to each insurance company in the federal marketplace and asked them to submit basic information -- who selected a plan and who paid for it.

The data submitted by the insurers paints an uneven picture about the status of enrollment and payment through April 15th. As of that date just two-thirds of enrollees through the federally facilitated marketplace paid their first month's premium. Some states are doing better than others. My home state of Pennsylvania, for example, has an 81 percent payment rate. Texas, on the other hand, is much lower at 42 percent. We recognize that many individuals still have time to pay their first month's premium, which is why we have asked insurers to update this information on May 20th.

As with any criticism or questions of the Affordable Care Act, the administration predictably protested and attempted to misrepresent the purpose of our inquiry. Let's be clear about why we had to engage in this exercise in the first place. The administration would not be transparent about enrollment and provide the underlying data. For the witnesses today, we ask you to be patient with our questions about enrollment and implementation. After months of promises about the status of healthcare.gov from HHS officials we have learned to be skeptical about blanket statements that everything is well.

One purpose of today's hearing is to examine enrollment because it is a key factor in measuring whether these exchanges are viable. We have a number of other questions for the witnesses today about the status of implementation. The ACA is more than a payment rate. We need to know if Americans can expect the premium reductions they were promised. We need to know if they can keep the plan they like. We need to know if they can keep their doctor.

We cannot understand the status of the law and its implementation without hearing from you, the insurance companies whose plans make up these exchanges. Under the president's health care law these companies will receive taxpayer dollars in the form of premium subsidies and cost-sharing.

We expect the witnesses today to provide the committee with facts and information about the first year of coverage under the Affordable Care Act. Thank you for the witnesses being here today. And I'd now like to recognize the ranking member, Ms. DeGette, for five minutes.

REPRESENTATIVE DIANA DEGETTE (D-CO): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I just want to take a few minutes, since the chairman has walked through the greatest hits of the problems they've had with the ACA, of where we stand now and where we stand after the first enrollment period has just closed. So as we continue to get information about how the exchanges and the Affordable Care Act and the enrollment are performing, let's review what we already know.

The first thing is, despite the disastrous beginning of the federal exchange, good news. The Web site was fixed. More than 8 million people signed up for insurance through the exchanges created through the Affordable Care Act, which is more than a million more than were originally projected before the disastrous unveiling.

Now, of those 8 million people that waited until the last month of enrollment -- of those 8 million people, 3 million of them waited to the last month of enrollment. And so their premiums are not due until April 30th, or in some cases later than April 30th. Even so, my colleagues in their quest for knowledge on the other side of the aisle sent out a questionnaire to insurers that manipulated the payment deadlines to skew the understanding of how new insurance coverage is performing.

How does that happen? Because they cut off the responses April 15th, at least two weeks before many of the premiums of these 3 million people were even due for payment. What this does is it skews the amount of people who are enrolled. Then of course they issued a press release posthaste.

Now for years my friends on the other side of the aisle have made a series of claims that really are unsubstantiated. First they claimed that the bill contained death panels. Then they claimed that the bill would eliminate private insurance within three years. Then they claimed that the law would destroy millions of jobs. When the Web site was broken, they insisted the law would never meet enrollment goals.

Now, Mr. Chairman, today we finally have a chance to see in a snapshot what's happening with the Affordable Care Act. And the facts reveal that every single one of those claims were wrong. As of today, as I said, more than 8 million people enrolled in private plans through federal and state marketplaces. Millions more have enrolled through Medicaid and in off-exchange plans.

Gallup just released a new poll finding that in the last six months the percentage of adults without insurance has dropped about 20 percent, and what that means is there are more than 11 million Americans with insurance today than there were six months ago. Premiums are below the levels predicted by the Congressional Budget Office and the agency has once again reiterated that the Affordable Care Act has slowed inflation and saved billions of dollars and will even reduce deficits. So by any rational, reasonable measure we can call this law a success, and that success will make a real difference in people's lives. That's what's important here.

Yesterday researchers from the Harvard School of Public Health released a comprehensive study on the impact of health insurance coverage. They were looking at mortality rates before and after the passage of "Romneycare," the landmark Massachusetts health insurance expansion that served as a model for the Affordable Care Act. They found that the mortality rate in Massachusetts fell by about 3 percent in the four years after passage of the state's health insurance law.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask unanimous consent to put a copy of that study into the record.

REP. MURPHY: Without objection.

REP. DEGETTE: Thank you. So if we can achieve that same level of success nationwide with the Affordable Care Act -- and there's no reason why we shouldn't be able to do so -- that could result in 17,000 fewer deaths per year. That, Mr. Chairman, in a nutshell is what the Affordable Care Act means for Americans.

Now what I wish we could do in this subcommittee, and I've said this both publicly and privately many, many times, is sit down with the ACA, figure out what the flaws are and figure out how we can work in a bipartisan way to fix it. And that's what I think we should do. Instead, what we get is this misleading analysis last week which said that only 67 percent of enrollees had paid for the coverage they enrolled in on the exchanges. And my chairman, Mr. Upton, said the administration's recent declarations of success may be unfounded.

But again, I will say the report was misleading because almost half of the enrollees in the health care exchanges, 40 percent of them, did not even have to make their initial premium payment until April 31st. I'm glad we've got the insurers here today to clear up this record. I'm glad we have everybody here to see exactly what we're talking about here.

So my suggestion is, let's look at the successes, let's look where we need to make improvements, and let's work together to do just that. Thank you.

REP. MURPHY: The gentlelady's time is expired. I now recommend the chairman of the full committee, Mr. Upton, for five minutes.

REPRESENTATIVE FRED UPTON (R-MI): With a friendly pat on the back I'll just say April 31st has yet to come. Thirty days hath September, April, June and November.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I thank the witnesses for being here today as well, for sure. At this subcommittee our investigations are about getting the facts. A quest for transparency, the self-proclaimed most transparent administration in history has repeatedly dodged our simple questions about the health care law and refused even a semblance of transparency about how its signature legislative achievement is or is not working.

We wanted the basic data from the administration on enrollment one week after the launch of healthcare.gov and the administration has rejected our request for more information each and every time. Members of the press have asked. The administration suggested the only way to get the facts was directly asking the insurance providers themselves. So we took their advice and we did just that, but the administration cried foul again.

We began asking about healthcare.gov months before October 1st of last year. Repeatedly we were told things were on track and working the way it was supposed to. We learned that this was not the case and administration officials did everything in their power, it seems, to hide the chaos behind the scenes. The American public does deserve better.

They deserve better than an administration that promised them $2,500 in savings on health care premiums, only to see the cost rise sharply for many.

They deserve better than an administration that repeated promises officials knew that would be impossible to keep, promises that Americans could keep their doctors and keep their health care plans also. Like it or not, millions of Americans have found themselves with the unwelcome reality of cancellations and lost access to their trusted doctor, and one Democratic colleague from Massachusetts said just two weeks ago the worst is yet to come.

Today we're going to hear firsthand from the insurance providers about how implementation is working, from their perspective. While the administration has declared this conversation over, the fact is that serious questions remain unanswered and it is our responsibility to continue seeking the facts. How many people have completed the enrollment process? Are the risks presented by these pools sustainable?

How much more will premiums rise this next year? Is the back end of the website on track to be working by the next enrollment period? Are there any other delays or changes ahead that will disrupt the ability of families and businesses to plan for their health care coverage and needs? Will more health care plans be cancelled in the coming years?

So what's wrong with seeking that information? Nothing that I know of. We released basic data points on enrollment as of April 15th and will do so again on the data that we collect through May 20th. The facts are the facts, and while the administration and its allies furiously try to muddy reality, the public deserves transparency. And while the administration toasts to the law's success with its Hollywood allies, declaring this conversation over, we will continue our pursuit for facts for the American people so that we can finally have a full accurate picture of this health care law, and I yield the balance of my time to Dr. Burgess.

REPRESENTATIVE MICHAEL BURGESS (R-TX): And I thank the chairman for yielding. I thank our witnesses for being here today. I know it's not always easy or pleasant to come before this subcommittee. I, like the chairman, wish that the administration had been a little bit more forthcoming about information, which would have obviated your need to be here today.

But I do appreciate the fact that you responded to our requests and that you have provided the data. The fact remains the administration has withheld facts or changed facts during the rollout of this law and that the federal agencies responsible for the implementation currently excel only in opacity.

So you are here today to provide that transparency that the American people were promised earlier in this administration and I thank you for being here. I have particular concern over one aspect and I will delve into it a little bit more during the questioning today. But that is the issue on the grace period --the 90-day period of time that is granted to people who are receiving the tax credits -- the advanced tax credits for the offset of the cost of their insurance.

If they don't pay their premium in spite of the tax credit they are given a grace period of 90 days. My understanding is that the companies will be responsible for the first 30 days. Beyond that, it will be the doctor, the hospital, the provider who submits the bill who may be on the hook for that, and I am very interested to know what you have in development to keep practices, to keep providers apprised of the fact that a patient's claim may be in the pending status when that claim is submitted.

I know from running a doctor's office you always call and verify benefits. But now we have a new realm that we've entered into. Not only would you identify that someone has been enrolled but that they've paid and that they're current on their payments so that the provider in question would not be at risk. So we will get into a little bit more on that in the question and answer period. I thank the chairman for the time and yield back.

REP. MURPHY: The gentleman's time has expired. I now recognize the ranking member of the full committee, Mr. Waxman, for five minutes.

REPRESENTATIVE HENRY WAXMAN (D-CA): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Last week, the Republican whip, Representative Kevin McCarthy, wrote an op-ed opposing the Affordable Care Act. He wrote, quote, "President Obama needs to learn a simple lesson -- saying something doesn't make it true," end quote. Well, psychologists call this projection -- a defense mechanism that involves ascribing your own behavior to others.

In one phrase, Representative McCarthy summed up five years of Republican opposition to the Affordable Care Act. Over and over, Republican leaders have fabricated criticism of the Affordable Care Act and none of them have been true. Republican leaders said that the ACA would create death panels. Well, there are none in the law. Republican leaders said that the law was unconstitutional.

The Supreme Court held exactly the opposite. Republican leaders said that the ACA would increase the deficit. Well, the nonpartisan Congressional Budget Office found that the law will reduce deficits by over a trillion dollars. Republican leaders said that the law would cause health care costs to skyrocket. In fact, in the three years after passage of the ACA, health care spending growth was at its lowest rate in 50 years.

Republican leaders said that the law would cause massive job losses. In reality, there have been 48 consecutive months of job creation since the ACA was passed with more than 9.2 million jobs created. Republican leaders said there would be a huge loss of coverage under the law. But every independent analysis shows that the number of Americans with health insurance is growing and the number of uninsured dropping rapidly. Republicans said enrollment would fall far short of CBO estimates because few Americans would sign up. At 8 million and growing, enrollment has exceeded everyone's expectations.

Mr. Chairman, I just summarized five years of relentless Republican opposition to the Affordable Care Act. It's a sad and, I believe, reprehensible record. The Republican Party is trying to scare families from getting the health insurance they need. We saw the same pattern just last week when this committee released another report claiming imminent failure.

This time, the report said that one-third of enrollees had not paid for coverage. There was just one problem. The data was incomplete, out of date and manipulated. Due to the late surge in enrollment, premiums were not even due for over 3 million Americans.

The testimony we're going to hear today from the insurers contradicts the Republican findings. That testimony says that 80 to 90 percent of enrollees have paid their premiums. Mr. Chairman, it was a mistake to release those inaccurate and misleading findings and it's not the first time this has happened. This morning, I released a memo describing the Republican record of distortion, exaggeration and misdirection. It's a sad record and I'd like to make it part of this hearing record.

The simple fact is despite five years of ceaseless opposition the Affordable Care Act is working. Over 8 million Americans have signed up for private health care coverage on the state and federal exchanges. Millions more have signed up for Medicaid. Premiums are well below CBO expectations.

No American ever has to fear being discriminated against or denied coverage based on a pre-existing condition.

No amount of blatant falsehoods and cynical partisanship can obscure the facts. The Affordable Care Act is an enormous step forward in the health of our nation, and I yield back the balance of my time and I appreciate this opportunity to set the record straight.

REP. MURPHY: Thank you. Gentleman yields back. We'll now move forward here with our witnesses. Just one moment, please. We went quicker and that's good. I just wasn't quite ready. So I'd like to introduce the panel for today's hearing. We have Mr. Mark Pratt, who's a senior vice president of state affairs for America's Health Insurance Plans.

Mr. Frank Coyne is the vice president of operations and chief transformation officer at Blue Cross Blue Shield Association. Mr. Paul Wingle -- am I saying that correctly -- is the executive director of individual businesses and public exchange operations and strategy for Aetna. Mr. Brian Evanko is the president of Individual Segment for Cigna Health and Life Insurance Company. Mr. Darren -- Mr. J. Darren Rodgers is the senior vice president and chief marketing officer at the Health Care Services Corporations (sic) and Mr. Dennis Matheis is the president of central region and exchange strategy at Wellpoint, Inc. I will now swear in the witnesses.

You are aware that this committee is holding an investigative hearing and when doing so we have the practice of taking testimony under oath. Do any of you have any objections to testifying under oath? All the witnesses have indicated no. The chair then advises you that under the rules of the House and the rules of the committee you are entitled to be advised by counsel. Do you desire to be advised by counsel during your testimony today? You do. Are you -- Mr. Wingle is saying you'd like to be advised by counsel. Well, if you're sitting by him that's fine. Anybody else? You have counsel behind you; you're certainly welcome at some point to ask clarification from them. That's fine.

In any case, would all you please rise and raise your right hand and I'll swear you in.

(Oath is administered)

REP. MURPHY: Thank you. You may be seated. All the witnesses have taken that oath and you are now under oath and subject to the penalties set forth in title 18, section 1001 of the United States Code. We'll have you now each give a five-minute opening statement. Please stick to the five minutes. You'll see a red light go on when you're at the end of your time.

Mr. Pratt, you may begin.

MARK PRATT: Chairman Murphy, Ranking Member DeGette and members of the subcommittee, I am Mark Pratt, senior vice president of state affairs in America's Health Insurance Plans. I lead AHIP's legislative and regulatory activities in the states, including implementation of the Affordable Care Act and our work with the National Association of Insurance Commissioners.

We appreciate this opportunity to testify on enrollment in the new health insurance exchanges and implementation of the ACA. Our written testimony focuses on two broad areas. One, our members' experience in the ACA's initial open enrollment period for 2014, and two, our members' priorities for improving access to high quality, affordable health coverage in 2015 and beyond.

Since the enactment of the ACA our members have been working to implement the law's many requirements, with a strong focus on delivering high-value coverage options for consumers. Helping them obtain the secure, affordable coverage they need has been our central goal throughout the implementation process.

While working on operational issues related to ACA implementation and providing recommendations to policymakers, our members have focused on several major goals, among them minimizing disruptions for consumers, businesses and stakeholders, ensuring the workability of the exchanges and allowing state flexibility; maximizing choice and competition, and addressing specific ACA provisions to make health coverage more affordable.

On numerous issues our members have provided technical assistance and expertise to assist federal agencies in resolving the operational challenges that surrounded the launch of the new exchanges and the healthcare.gov Web site. They have devoted significant resources to performing manual processes and work-arounds that were necessitated by the problems following the October 1 launch. Despite the challenges, our members encountered, we are proud that they ultimately were successful in offering a broad range of high-value coverage options to consumers who were enrolled in exchanges in 2014.

HHS has reported that approximately 8 million individuals signed up for exchange plans during the initial open enrollment period for 2014. While uncertainty remains with respect to how many people have paid their first month's premium, health insurers have been doing everything possible to encourage exchange enrollees to pay their premiums.

In the coming weeks we anticipate that there will be greater clarity on the question of how many exchange enrollees have paid their premiums. A number of individual plans have publicly announced their preliminary data and we anticipate that more announcements will be forthcoming. However, there may be a period of time before system- wide numbers on premium payments are available. Our members will continue their ongoing outreach to encourage exchange enrollees to pay their premiums.

Looking forward, we continue to believe that affordability must be the central priority as we focus on further expanding access to high-quality, affordable health coverage -- health insurance coverage in 2015 and beyond. One critically important step that Congress can take to make coverage more affordable is to delay the ACA health insurance tax and eventually repeal it.

We are deeply concerned that this tax is undermining efforts to control costs and provide affordable coverage options. We strongly support bipartisan legislation to fully repeal the tax introduced by Representatives Boustany and Matheson and co-sponsored by 230 House members. We also support as a short-term solution separate bipartisan legislation that proposes a two-year delay in the tax.

On another front, and in closing, we have worked closely with our members to provide comments to federal agencies on dozens of proposed rules and other regulatory documents. We consistently have emphasized the importance of creating a regulatory environment that promotes a wide range of affordable coverage options.

Thank you again for this opportunity to testify. I look forward to your questions.

REP. MURPHY: Thank you, Mr. Pratt. I thank you for -- (inaudible) -- yield back. Now we recognize Mr. Coyne for his five minutes. Thank you.

FRANK COYNE: Good morning, Chairman Murphy, Ranking Member DeGette and members of the subcommittee. Thank you for the invitation to testify here today. I am Frank Coyne, vice president in the office of the president for the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association, which represents the 37 independent community-based Blue Cross and Blue Shield companies that collectively provide health coverage for 100 million Americans.

Blue Cross and Blue Shield companies offer health care coverage in every zip code in the country and have long been committed to offering consumers across the country a wide variety of insurance options. My remarks today focus on the Blues' participation in the multi-state plan program administered by the Office of Personnel Management and enrollment in Blue Cross and Blue Shield's MSP plans.

The Affordable Care Act authorizes OPM to contract with at least two entities, at least one of which must be a not-for-profit, to offer products on the state and federal marketplaces. Under this multi-state plan program, OPM certifies health plans in conjunction with states for placement on the exchanges. For 2014 OPM certified Blue Cross and Blue Shield companies to offer multi-state plan products in 30 states and the District of Columbia. Collectively Blue Cross and Blue Shield companies offer more than 150 multi-state plan products.

OPM has developed a standard contract for OPM issuers that meets its requirements. The association is party to that contract with OPM and our Blue licensee plans have agreements with us to fulfill many aspects of that contract, such as customer enrollment, benefits and claims administration and customer service, among other activities.

In addition, the contract contains a requirement to report enrollment information to OPM. In order to fulfill this requirement we ask Blue plans to report information on their multistate plan enrollments to us and we convey enrollment information to OPM. As of April 1st, 2014, a total of 283,783 individuals have selected an MSP plan.

I appreciate the opportunity to discuss Blue participation in enrollment in the MSP plan and I look forward to your questions.

REP. MURPHY: Thank you, Mr. Coyne. Now Mr. Wingle, you're recognized for five minutes. Move it as close as you can get it.

PAUL WINGLE: Sure.

REP. MURPHY: Thank you.

MR. WINGLE: Good morning, Chairman Murphy, Ranking Member DeGette and distinguished members of the subcommittee. My name is Paul Wingle and I am executive director of individual business and public exchange operations and strategy at Aetna. Thank you for inviting us to today's hearing. I have a brief opening statement and will then be happy to answer any questions you may have.

Aetna is currently participating in the individual market on the exchanges in 17 states. Over the course of approximately the last two months, Aetna has worked with the subcommittee to provide requested data and information related to enrollment in plans offered through federally facilitated marketplaces. As of the third week of April, Aetna had over 600,000 members who had enrolled and roughly 500,000 members who had paid. For those who had reached their payment due date, the payment rate, though dynamic, has been in the low to mid-80 percent range.

As outlined in our prior submissions to the subcommittee, these are dynamic figures and do not reflect final enrollment numbers, as some enrollees have not yet reached their payment due dates. An example would be a member with a June 1 policy effective date who has not yet paid but whose initial payment is not yet due. We are happy to continue to work with the subcommittee to provide updated information and data and note that, as the subcommittee has recognized, this might include material, nonpublic, confidential and proprietary information.

Thank you again for the opportunity to be here today and I would be happy to answer any questions you may have.

REP. MURPHY: Thank you, Mr. Wingle. He yields back. And now Mr. Evanko, you're recognized for five minutes.

BRIAN EVANKO: Chairman Murphy, Ranking Member DeGette, members of the subcommittee, good morning and thank you for the opportunity to testify at this hearing on PPACA enrollment and the insurance industry. I'm Brian Evanko and I currently serve as president of the U.S. Individual Segment at Cigna Corporation. I oversee the operation tasked with developing, promoting and maintaining the Cigna products that are offered in the individual health market, including those products that are offered on the exchanges set up pursuant to the Patient Protection and Affordable Care Act, or ACA.

Cigna's a global health services company dedicated to helping people improve their health, well-being and sense of security. Through its subsidiaries, Cigna offers an integrated suite of health services, such as medical, dental, behavioral health, pharmacy and vision care benefits, along with other related products, including group disability, life and accident coverage. We employ more than 26,000 people and have sales capability in 30 countries and jurisdictions. We manage more than 80 million customer relationships throughout the world.

Despite our large footprint, 80 percent of Cigna's overall health care business consists of administrative services. This means that we help employers to administer their policies. We also administer claims processes, which are not risk-based like traditional insurance. Many of the employers that we assist are self-insuring, and the claim payments come out of the employers' own funds.

Cigna's traditional insurance business is concentrated in the large-group market. We have a very limited presence in the individual market, including on the ACA exchanges. The individual market currently constitutes approximately 3 percent of Cigna's total revenue. We currently offer health insurance products on the exchanges in five states, four of which -- Arizona, Florida, Tennessee and Texas -- are Federally Facilitated Marketplaces. The only state- run exchange in which Cigna's participating is in Colorado.

We have entered the exchanges on a focused basis in 2014 to gather deeper learning about consumer behaviors in the individual market, to understand the operational implications of how the exchanges function, and as a potential longer-term source of growth for Cigna. For 2014, we did not expect the exchanges to have a significant financial impact on our company.

The health insurance marketplace is evolving rapidly. And Cigna, like other health insurance companies, is constantly challenged to maintain affordability, accessibility and consumer choice in its product offerings. Cigna has worked collaboratively with our clients and customers, health care professionals, state and federal regulators, as well as other stakeholders to maintain our heritage of providing high-quality health insurance products and services while adapting to the ACA and other statutory and regulatory changes.

We believe that health care is a shared responsibility of the individual, the private sector, the medical community and the government. Accordingly, we look forward to how we can all work together to improve the health and wellness of and the quality of care for all Americans.

I'd welcome any questions that you may have.

REP. MURPHY: Mr. Evanko yields back. We now go to Mr. Rodgers, who we recognize for up to five minutes.

J. DARREN RODGERS: Good morning, Chairman Murphy. Good morning, Chairman Murphy and members of the subcommittee. I'm Darren Rodgers. I'm senior vice president --

REP. MURPHY: Just bring the mic as close to you as possible, because we can't hear up here.

MR. RODGERS: Okay.

REP. MURPHY: Thank you. Speak right into it.

MR. RODGERS: Good morning again, everyone.

I'm Darren Rodgers. I'm senior vice president and chief marketing officer at Health Care Service Corporation, or HCSC.

HCSC is a mutual legal reserve company which does business as Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Illinois, Montana, New Mexico, Oklahoma and Texas. HCSC is the largest customer-owned nonprofit health insurance company in the nation. We're headquarted in Chicago, Illinois, with a workforce of nearly 20,000 employees serving nearly 14 million members throughout our five-state Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans.

For over 80 years, HCSC has been committed to expanding access to cost-effective health care to as many people as possible in every part of each of our five states. Whether through employer-sponsored insurance, government programs or individual products, HCSC is committed to its purpose and to offering our customers a wide range of cost-effective and sustainable product choices to meet the needs of -- to meet their health and wellness needs.

As we transition to a new health care marketplace, HCSC remains committed to its individual and small-employer markets, and continuing to offer accessible products, particularly to those individuals who do not have access to employer-sponsored coverage.

We're proud of what our brands stand for -- security and peace of mind -- and our commitment to the communities in which we operate, as well as our large and geographically diverse network of health care providers in our operating states. This allows us to offer a variety of affordable product choices in every county of every state in which we operate.

To support our individual and small-employer market, HCSC participated in the health insurance exchanges. We offered a similar portfolio of products both on and off exchange, with a variety of deductibles, co-pays, coverages and other options, with the goal of meeting our members' diverse health care needs.

At the current time, enrollment and payment information can only be presented as of each day, when the numbers are counted. As such, there are natural lags between the effective date of coverage and the date on which the member's coverage payment may be due. For instance, applicants with policies with an effective date of May 1 still have time remaining in their payment deadline. In addition, adjustments and reconciliations to this data are ongoing. The data HCSC is providing represents our good-faith estimate based on our records to date.

With these caveats, HCSC received between October 1, 2013 and April 15, 2014, approximately 830,000 applications across our five states, comprised of approximately 600,000 on-exchange and 230,000 off-exchange applications. We estimate that these 830,000 applications represent coverage for just over 1.2 million applicants.

In the written copy of my opening statement we provided a snapshot of our current first-month payment rate. As you can see, January through April look fairly consistent and range from 83 to 93 percent. The payment rates for May are currently less because payments are still coming in and being posted.

HCSC is and always has been committed to improving access to quality of care for all Americans. I thank you on behalf of HCSC for the opportunity to be a part of this important discussion.

REP. MURPHY: I thank the gentleman.

Now Mr. Matheis, you're recognized for five minutes.

DENNIS MATHEIS: Chairman Murphy, Ranking Member DeGette and members of the House Energy and Commerce Subcommittee on Oversight and Investigations, thank you for the opportunity to be here today on behalf of Wellpoint.

I am Dennis Matheis, president of the central region and exchange strategy. I am responsible for creating Wellpoint's exchange strategy and overseeing its launch. Prior to my current role, I was president of Anthem Blue Cross and Blue Shield in Missouri.

Wellpoint is one of the nation's leading health benefit companies. We believe that our health connects us all. So we focus on being a valued health partner and delivering quality products and services that give members access to the care they need. With nearly 67 million people served by our affiliated companies, including nearly 37 million enrolled in our family of health plans, we can make a real difference to meet the needs of our diverse constituents.

We are an independent licensee of the Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association. We serve members as the Blue Cross licensee for California and as the Blue Cross and Blue Shield licensee for Colorado, Connecticut, Georgia, Indiana, Kentucky, Maine, Missouri, Nevada, New Hampshire, New York, Ohio, Virginia and Wisconsin. In most of these service areas, our plans do business as Anthem Blue Cross, Anthem Blue Cross and Blue Shield, Blue Cross and Blue Shield of Georgia, and Empire Blue Cross Blue Shield, or Empire Blue Cross. We also serve customers in other states through our Amerigroup and CareMore subsidiaries.

Wellpoint is currently operating in the Federally Facilitated Exchange, which includes Georgia, Indiana, Maine, Missouri, New Hampshire, Ohio, Virginia and Wisconsin. We also participate in several state-based exchanges, including California, Colorado, Connecticut, Kentucky, New York and Nevada. While there is no doubt that implementation of the exchanges presents a complex and daunting undertaking, we believe we've been able to apply our knowledge and experience to make the system work better for our members. We are seeing strong membership growth and large percentages of our newly enrolled customers are successfully paying their premiums by the due date.

Our most important priority through all of the complexity of ACA implementation is to ensure that our members receive the best possible care. Working closely and collaboratively with the physician community, our innovative programs -- from new payment models to telehealth solutions to sophisticated data analytics that arm physicians with better information -- we are creating value for our members, for physicians, and for the health care system. We are proud of the work we are doing to transform health care.

Wellpoint was pleased to provide the committee last month with enrollment data from October 1st, 2013 through April 15th, 2014 for states where we participate in the Federally Facilitated Exchange. As we stated to the committee at the time of submission, this data is not final and only represents a snap-shot in time. The data included enrollees whose policies have effective dates of April 1st, May 1st, and June 1st, which means that premiums for such policies would not be due until April 10th, May 10th and June 10th, respectively. Also, the reported enrollment and premium payment data is subject to adjustments. For examples, enrollees may elect to drop their coverage, elect to change the effective date of their coverage after submission of their application, or continue to enroll through special enrollment periods.

In response to the committee's request, we submitted the total number of applications received for enrollment in the Federally Facilitated Exchange during the period October 1, 2013 through April 15, 2014.

The percentage of applications that have paid a premium will differ depending on whether the percentage is calculated based on the total number of applications and premium payments received during this entire period, roughly, 70 percent, or is calculated based on the total number of applications and premium payments received for policies whose premium deadline has passed, ranging up to 90 percent, depending on the state.

Wellpoint feels privileged to be able to serve our growing community of members. We take great pride in transforming health care with trusted, caring, creative and innovative solutions. I thank the committee for the opportunity to testify today on behalf of Wellpoint and look forward to your questions.

REP. MURPHY: Thank you. (Inaudible) -- record all the witnesses did not go over time and we'll make sure we fill in the gaps here with what was not been provided to us and see if we can get some information. Do any of you -- particularly from the insurance companies, do any of you have -- I'm recognizing myself for five minutes, by the way -- have any data among those people who have subscribed is if the cost they're paying for their overall health insurance plan is more, less or the same as they were paying in a previous year? Mr. Wingle, does your -- do you keep that data?

MR. WINGLE: I don't have that data available.

REP. MURPHY: Mr. Evanko, do you know if your -- if your plan has that?

MR. EVANKO: I don't have specific figures to share. I can try to provide some context -- (inaudible).

REP. MURPHY: Would you submit it for the record? Mr. Rodgers, Mr. Matheis, do your plans keep that record of what people paid in a previous year versus what they're paying now?

MR. : No. I haven't looked.

REP. MURPHY: Thank you. And of those who have signed up for insurance, do any of your companies ask for -- have any data if people were among those who had lost their insurance -- that is, their insurance was cancelled because (of change ?) in the Affordable Care Act? Any of you from insurance companies -- any of you have that data?

MR. : We currently do not have that information available.

REP. MURPHY: OK. And all right. Thank you. So we don't know if the people who were signing up for these health insurance plans are people who are renewing insurance, had lost insurance or never had insurance. Am I correct? Mr. Wingle, Mr. Evanko, Mr. Rodgers, Matheis? OK.

MR. : That's correct.

REP. MURPHY: I know -- I know Secretary Sebelius said that she didn't think we had that data either. Mr. Wingle, your chief executive, Mark Bertolini, said that premium rates in 2015 will range from very low single digits to some that will be over double digits. Can consumers expect this for their 2015 premiums?

MR. WINGLE: It's important to recognize, first of all, that we're at the start of the rate filing and approval process. So we're very early in the process of establishing those rates and submitting them to state regulators for approval and review. Our rates, it's also important to understand, reflect a number of key factors, most importantly the benefits covered by the plans we're filing, the population covered by those plans and the underlying health care costs and the geographies where those plans are offered. There will be some variability across geography and depending on those circumstances.

REP. MURPHY: So some might face double digit increases -- we don't know yet, you're saying?

MR. WINGLE: I can't say for certain whether some will pay double digits, single digits or no increase at all. It's too early to say.

REP. MURPHY: If there's no increase in insurance we should all celebrate because I'm not sure that has existed in my lifetime. Will there -- will there be decreases?

MR. WINGLE: It's hard to say. It'll vary by geography and ratings.

REP. MURPHY: All right. Mr. Matheis, you announced your quarterly earnings and noted that if the ramp-up in the fee (of ?) government is charging insurers under the health care law would impact marketplace premiums next year. What can consumers expect?

MR. MATHEIS: So similar to my colleague's comment, we are in the process of developing our rates now for the 138 rating regions in which we do business across the 14 states. So I don't have exact numbers yet, Chairman, in terms of what our rate increases are going to be. Certainly, inputs into that are the experience that we're developing through the population that we're serving, the expected medical trend that's going to occur and then the fees and taxes that occur through the ACA and through state and other federal constructs. That all goes into the rate construct process.

REP. MURPHY: I think I'm going down the same hole with each of you so let me cut to the chase. The bottom line here is you do get -- for risk corridors you do get some money back from the federal government to balance out some of the -- your costs -- am I correct -- with each plan? Mr. Evanko, is that true?

MR. EVANKO: The risk corridors, as you know, sir, are part of the three R's. We at Cigna Corporation are not expecting a material receivable or a payable as it relates to risk corridors.

REP. MURPHY: My point is that as we're looking at this data, and we'll continue to monitor and we recognize some of this is still preliminary, based upon who has signed up and what their health care costs are -- for example, if we don't reach -- if you don't reach the 40 percent number that the president -- (inaudible) -- people between 18 and 35 and mostly those who've signed up have been the older and sicker, then that's going to have an impact upon your plan costs. Am I correct, Mr. Rodgers?

MR. RODGERS: Could you restate that question?

REP. MURPHY: That if people who have signed up are not the young healthy invincibles but are, indeed, the older folks who have pre- existing conditions and other health care costs that you're going to have to face some sort of an increase in premiums. Am I correct?

MR. RODGERS: Well, as two of my colleagues have said, the rates that we filed for 2015 haven't been finalized yet but those will reflect -- (inaudible).

REP. MURPHY: I understand. Anticipating -- you've been in the business for a while. And the federal government does provide some funds for you to help balance these out. Am I correct? Federal money comes to you to help (as ?) the risk corridors and you have other people there who -- the increased costs go up. Am I correct?

MR. RODGERS: The three R's program does exist to provide some guardrails. We have not --

REP. MURPHY: Right. But over time that amount of money from the federal government will decline. Am I correct?

MR. RODGERS: Some of those programs are traditional -- transitional and one is permanent.

REP. MURPHY: I understand. But we're going to -- we'll get back to this. Thank you. I yield and recognize Ms. DeGette for five minutes.

REP. DEGETTE: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Last week, the majority Republicans on this committee put out a report stating that only 67 percent of the people who signed up for insurance through the state and federal marketplaces had paid their first month's premiums and then had a big press blitz about that, saying that "Obamacare" had once again failed. So I kind of want to walk some of you through that allegation and see how true it is. I want to start with you, Mr. Matheis.

I believe that the press reports I've seen -- the reports from the administration show that through the end of March, which was the deadline, about 8.1 people enrolled through either the federal or state exchanges. Is that correct, to your knowledge?

MR. MATHEIS: Did you mean 8.1 million?

REP. DEGETTE: Yes.

MR. MATHEIS: Yes.

REP. DEGETTE: And --

MR. MATHEIS: I have -- I have the same source of data that you do have -- (inaudible).

REP. DEGETTE: That's fine. Now, in your -- in your testimony you said that the data used in that Republican analysis, quote, "included enrollees whose policies have effective dates of April 1, May 1 and June 1." Is that correct?

MR. MATHEIS: Yes.

REP. DEGETTE: And that's about 3 million out of 8 million people -- about 40 percent. Is that correct?

MR. MATHEIS: Again, since we didn't enroll all 8 million people I can't attest to that question or not.

REP. DEGETTE: But -- okay. Well, I will say what I've seen is it's about 3 million out of 8 million. Now, so the 3 million people who enrolled -- or let me just say the people who enrolled in March they had coverage in general that began no earlier than May 1. Is that right?

MR. MATHEIS: If you enrolled in March you would have potentially an effective date, depending on what day of the month you enrolled in, could be April 1st, could have been May 1st.

REP. DEGETTE: May 1st. And so those people's premiums were not due until at the earliest the end of April. Is that correct? If you enrolled March 31st your premiums were due at the end of April or later, right?

MR. MATHEIS: To help facilitate members enrolling what we have done at Wellpoint is actually extended the payment period 10 days beyond the last day of -- (inaudible).

REP. DEGETTE: So it could -- it could be April 30th or it could even be later, correct?

MR. MATHEIS: So an April 1st --

REP. DEGETTE: Yes or no will work.

MR. MATHEIS: An April 1st effective --

REP. DEGETTE: Right.

MR. MATHEIS: -- could actually have until May 10th to pay their premium.

REP. DEGETTE: OK. Now, Mr. Matheis, let me ask you, your testimony said for Wellpoint ACA policies whose deadline for paying premiums has passed about 90 percent have paid their premiums. Is that correct?

MR. MATHEIS: So our data in our --

REP. DEGETTE: You can say yes or no. That's what your testimony said.

MR. MATHEIS: Yes. So it --

REP. DEGETTE: OK. Now, that's more than 67 percent. Is that correct?

MR. MATHEIS: Last time I looked, yeah, it's greater than 67.

REP. DEGETTE: OK. Now, Mr. Wingle, let me -- let me take you off the hot seat, Mr. Matheis. Mr. Wingle, I want to ask you, Aetna has shown of the -- of the 5 (hundred) to 600 enrollees who have paid about 85 percent up until March paid their premiums. Is that correct?

MR. WINGLE: Our range is in the low to mid-80s month to month.

REP. DEGETTE: OK. And that's also more than 67 percent, isn't it?

MR. WINGLE: Empirically, yes.

REP. DEGETTE: Yes. And Mr. Rodgers, let me ask you, for your company the ACA payment policies whose premium payment deadlines have passed about 83 to 85 percent of them have paid their premiums. Is that correct?

MR. RODGERS: Except for the most recent months.

REP. DEGETTE: Right. The ones whose payment -- the deadlines have passed.

MR. RODGERS: Yes. That is correct.

REP. DEGETTE: Yes. And that's also more than 67 percent, isn't it?

MR. RODGERS: That is more than 67.

REP. DEGETTE: Yes.

So what I wanted to ask about is, do any of you expect to see substantially lower payment percentages than you saw historically before the latest enrollment? Mr. Matheis?

MR. MATHEIS: So I will give a little context. My --

REP. DEGETTE: OK, I need a yes or no. I don't have much time. I'm sorry. Do you expect to see it go down to 67 percent for April?

MR. MATHEIS: I don't think we have enough information to know exactly where it's going to be.

REP. DEGETTE: OK. Well, Mr. Rodgers, let me ask you this question then. Mr. Upton said that he thinks suddenly maybe they won't pay for their enrollment in March. So I wanted to kind of go through because you've got a nice chart in your testimony and it shows that the payments month by month that people made when they enrolled. So for 1/1/2014 on the exchange, 85 percent of the people, is that correct?

MR. RODGERS: That's correct.

REP. DEGETTE: For 2/1/2014, 86 percent paid, correct?

MR. RODGERS: That's correct.

REP. DEGETTE: For 3/1/2014, 88 percent paid. Is that correct?

MR. RODGERS: Yes.

REP. DEGETTE: And for 4/1/2014, 83 percent paid. Is that correct?

MR. RODGERS : That is correct.

REP. DEGETTE: And you're still waiting for everybody else to pay because their deadline has not passed yet. Is that correct?

MR. RODGERS : That's correct.

REP. DEGETTE: Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

REP. MURPHY: Can I just ask a follow-up clarifying question? When she asked about historical data, were you referring to the last couple of months or comparison with previous years under a different plan?

REP. DEGETTE: Well, we didn't have an exchange --

REP. MURPHY: No, no, I just --

REP. DEGETTE: Mr. Chairman, we only just got the exchange --

REP. MURPHY: No, I wasn't sure if you meant under historical -- you mean previous years of plan versus just the exchange.

REP. DEGETTE: No, Mr. Chairman, what I mean is, since the ACA was implemented starting on October 1.

REP. MURPHY: Thank you. I just wanted clarification on that. I now recognize Ms. Blackburn for five minutes.

REPRESENTATIVE MARSHA BLACKBURN (R-TN): Thank you all so much for being with us. I want to stay with this issue on the premiums because we get asked about this a lot. So Mr. Wingle, Aetna. Your CEO said that premium increases will vary over 17 states and encompass 132 rating areas, correct?

MR. WINGLE: That is correct.

REP. BLACKBURN: OK. Can you identify where premiums will decrease in 2015? What identification can you place on that?

MR. WINGLE: At this point in the filing season we can't offer any guidance on or speculate on where they're going to fall. We're still gathering the information on file.

REP. BLACKBURN: None?

MR. WINGLE: I can't say none, I can't (ph 2:30) say any.

REP. BLACKBURN: OK. Mr. Matheis, can you tell me -- identify any states where you are offering products in the exchanges where consumers can expect a premium decrease?

MR. MATHEIS: At this juncture we do not have the information.

REP. BLACKBURN: You don't have the information?

MR. MATHEIS: No. The filing rates are due starting in late May into June, and so we have not computed yet with any certainty what the actual rates are going to look like in our 138 rating regions.

REP. BLACKBURN: OK, a lot of uncertainty floating around out there. OK, Mr. Evanko?

MR. EVANKO: I would echo my colleague's comments. We're in the process of making decisions. Some decisions on certain assumptions are made but most assumptions are still to be determined.

REP. BLACKBURN: So you don't know if your consumers are going to see any decreases. You know, they were promised decreases through the Affordable Care Act. So OK, Mr. Rodgers, to you.

MR. RODGERS: As the company's marketing officer, I can tell you I'm not involved in rate-setting but I'm aware of some of the deadlines we're facing, which are generally toward the end of --

REP. BLACKBURN: OK, well, let me ask you all this then. Have any of you conducted any internal analysis of what your organization's premiums are going to look like in 2015? Do any of you have any internal analysis? Raise your hand for me. So you all have conducted no -- we've got some of our nation's biggest insurers and you have done no internal analysis on what the trend line is for these premiums. None? Oh, Mr. Evanko, have at it.

MR. EVANKO: I'd like to just clarify our comments here a little bit, at least my comments as it relates to this issue. The decisions related to this are very complicated and they impact each individual a little bit differently because of where someone's located, maybe what their APTC eligibility is, et cetera. There's a long list of reasons.

REP. BLACKBURN: Right. We understand that. You're talking about a 2,300-page law that became about -- over 20,000 pages of rules and regulations and we know this changes daily. We appreciate the predicament that you are in. We also appreciate the predicament that our constituents find themselves in, and it is baffling that we can have some of our nation's largest insurers and you all don't have any internal analysis as to what these rates are -- I thought that, reading your reports, you all did analysis and trend lines for the near term, the midterm and the long term, and you look at what the expectations were so that your stakeholders would all be aware of what was happening within that market.

You know, has anybody done any kind of analysis? Yes, please, have it, Mr. Matheis. Your mic, please.

MR. MATHEIS: So analysis is typically ongoing in our organization. Rate development typically takes three to six months to occur once you have credible information. So just for context purposes we, I mean as has been stated earlier --

REP. BLACKBURN: OK, let me --

MR. MATHEIS: in this meeting -- let me finish.

REP. BLACKBURN: OK, go ahead.

MR. MATHEIS: We are just now understanding what membership we have attracted, and so the work is ongoing but it has not been finalized. That's the important point.

REP. BLACKBURN: What has been prepared for your CEO? Any of you.

MR. MATHEIS: At this juncture we do not have a compiled package to sit down and say, here's what we believe a rate is going to be in any of our 138 rate --

REP. BLACKBURN: OK, when do you expect to have that?

MR. MATHEIS: Typically it will be towards the end of this month as rates need to be filed in our states starting end of May through the June, July time period.

REP. BLACKBURN: Would you submit that to us for the record, each of you. Do you agree to submit this for the record so that we will have this?

MR. : Representative, I want to concur with my colleague. We are constantly analyzing our exchange experience. This is a new population. We don't have a long claims record or history we have from -- we had in the previous markets. So the more data we get the better, and more confident we feel as we propose rates. It's an ongoing analysis --

REP. BLACKBURN: OK, we appreciate that and we would like to have that analysis and the information you have as you get it and ask that you please stay in touch with us and do those orderly insertions for the record. I yield back, Mr. Chairman.

REP. MURPHY: The gentlelady yields back. I now recognize Mr. Dingell for five minutes.

REPRESENTATIVE JOHN DINGELL (D-MI): Mr. Chairman, I thank you for your courtesy, I thank you for the hearing. I am pleased the committee is examining the first open enrollment period under the Affordable Care Act. I would like to examine the staff report where it claims only 67 percent of "Obamacare" enrollees have paid their first month's premium. We want to find out whether that's so and what it means.

The bottom line, I think, is ACA is working. After a turbulent start we got the Web site up and running and HHS now reports that 8 million people have selected plans through the exchanges. Furthermore, some 4.8 million people are enrolled in Medicaid and CHIP and that number would be much higher if all 50 states chose to expand Medicaid.

CBO estimates that another 5 million people purchased ACA- compliant plans outside the marketplaces. Finally, Gallup just found that the percentage of Americans who do not have health insurance fell to 13.4 percent, down from some 18 percent one year ago. So let's examine and see what goes on.

This question to Mr. Matheis, and yes or no, if you please. When Wellpoint turned over enrollment figures to the majority, you did this under the caveat that the data was not final and only represented a snapshot in time. Is that correct?

MR. MATHEIS: Yes, it is.

REP. DINGELL: Yes?

MR. MATHEIS: Yes.

REP. DINGELL: Now, this question again to you, Mr. Matheis. And that is because the committee only requested data through April 15, 2014. Is that correct?

MR. MATHEIS: Yes, it is.

REP. DINGELL: Now Mr. Matheis, is it correct that the people who signed up after May 15 may not have to pay their premium until later in April, May or even June? Yes or no.

MR. MATHEIS: Is there anybody after April 15th would have --

REP. DINGELL: That's folks who signed up after March 15.

MR. MATHEIS: Yes.

REP. DINGELL: Now Mr. Matheis, is it correct that nearly 90 percent of Wellpoint's customers whose premium deadline has passed have already paid their first month's premium? Yes or no.

MR. MATHEIS: Yes, it is.

REP. DINGELL: Now, in your experience have you found that people are more likely to make their premium payment right before the deadline?

MR. MATHEIS: That is typically human nature, sir.

REP. DINGELL: And we know that from the behavior of Americans with regard to income tax, things like that. Now this question is for Mr. Wingle of Aetna. Is it correct that according to your best estimate roughly 80 percent of Aetna beneficiaries who reached their payment due date have paid their first months premium? Yes or no.

MR. WINGLE: Month to month, it ranges from the low to mid-80s.

REP. DINGELL: Say that again.

MR. WINGLE: It ranges from the low to mid-80s month by month.

REP. DINGELL: Thank you.

Now, this question for you, Mr. Coyne, of Blue Cross Blue Shield. Is it correct that according to your best estimate, 80 to 85 percent of the individuals buying Blue Cross Blue Shield plans through the marketplace have paid their first month's premiums? Yes or no?

MR. COYNE: Yes, that is correct.

REP. DINGELL: I'm not hearing you, sir.

MR. COYNE: Yes, that is correct based on a report --

REP. DINGELL: That's correct. Now, gentlemen, it doesn't take I think a genius or an atomic physicist to figure out the numbers we just heard from the actual insurance companies greatly differ from the staff report. I hope everyone will take these companies at their word instead of falling for smoke and mirrors from my friends on the other side of the aisle. I can understand why my friends on the other side of the aisle are not in attendance because they would get a very unpleasant taste of fact which they might not like. My old daddy taught me, he used to say to me, son, figures don't lie. But liars can figure.

And I've always thought that it would be a good thing when this committee does its business that we know what we're doing, that we deal in hard facts so that when the legislation that we work on, the laws that we are dealing with, the oversight in which we engage, actually leads to truth and correct response so that public policies may be founded on fact rather than fiction and on staff reports that mislead all. I would suggest that the staff report should be reviewed with the utmost of care and deposited then very carefully in the nearest large wastebasket. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. MURPHY: The gentleman yields back. I'll now recognize the vice chair of the committee, Mr. Burgess, or Dr. Burgess, for five minutes.

REPRESENTATIVE MICHAEL BURGESS (R-TX): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. I thank you for the recognition. I remind the chairman emeritus that we are friends. Let me ask you a question. April 17th, the day the president came out with his mission accomplished speech at the White House in the press briefing, there was a briefing of executives of your companies, is that correct? Anyone is free to answer. Well, Mr. Coyne, let me --

MR. COYNE: I believe that was correct, sir.

REP. BURGESS: And was your company represented?

MR. MATHEIS: I'm not sure which particular meeting you're describing but I know there have been some.

REP. BURGESS: Well, let me give you the particular meeting. It was on April the 17th, at 1:35 p.m. The president and vice president meet with insurance executives in the Roosevelt Room. Did that meeting take place?

MR. MATHEIS: Wellpoint was present at that meeting, sir.

REP. BURGESS: Wellpoint was present. Was Cigna present?

MR. EVANKO: Our CEO was not present at that meeting.

REP. BURGESS: Was not, OK.

MR. WINGLE: I'm advised that our CEO was not present at that meeting.

REP. BURGESS: That was Blue Cross?

MR. WINGLE: That's Aetna for me.

REP. BURGESS: Was Blue Cross represented at the meeting?

MR. COYNE: I don't have that information right now.

REP. BURGESS: Well, for those that were --

MR. PRATT: Just for the record, I'm advised that AHIP's president was present at the meeting.

MR. COYNE: And I don't -- I can't remember the exact date of those meetings but I can tell you that when we're called to the White House, generally we would attempt to be there.

REP. BURGESS: It was April 17th. I mean, I would think you'd remember. It's a pretty big deal. I mean, I haven't had a meeting with the president and the vice president.

REP. DEGETTE: Will the gentleman yield? Perhaps -- (inaudible) -- there.

REP. BURGESS: No, I will not. My time is -- my time is limited. What I would like from those that answered affirmatively, Mr. Matheis and Mr. Pratt, can you provide us information as to what was covered in that meeting? Who made the presentation, how long it was and was there in fact time for there to be question-and-answer or was it simply a presentation to you from the president and vice president.

MR. MATHEIS: Mr. Congressman, I was not personally present at that meeting. Our CEO was and I do not know the facts of the meeting.

REP. BURGESS: Would you make an attempt to answer for me those questions? Was in fact -- was this an interactive process or was this a proclamation? Was it a monologue or was it a dialogue? And then, Mr. Pratt, if you would provide us that information as well. And here's the deal. I mean, why am I making -- why am I making a big deal of this? You all are here today because the White House won't respond to us.

And I would think if it was possible for the White House to provide a briefing to your executives on April 17th, that same person could be made available to this committee and be prepared to answer our questions. I don't see what is so difficult about that. If the news is as great as everyone has said it is this morning, I think that they would welcome the opportunity to come to our committee and give us the information that we're asking for.

So one of the questions that I raised in the opening statement, and I do want your answers on this because it is important, this 90- day grace period and the coverage that can't be cancelled during that 90-day grace period because of nonpayment, is there any way for any of your individual companies to keep up with that information on a rolling basis and keep your providers informed as to the status of a person's payment or nonpayment of their premium? Start with you, Mr. Coyne, and let's just work down the table.

MR. COYNE: We're working with Blue Plans to inform providers of the enrollee status, as you indicated.

REP. BURGESS: Mr. Wingle?

MR. WINGLE: Yes. We do have a unique identifier for our exchange membership on the I.D. card and we do provide updates on the member's payment status in our physician information centers. So when the physician offices call or the provider calls, they understand what the payment status is of the member.

REP. BURGESS: Mr. Evanko?

MR. EVANKO: Our doctors and our hospitals that are servicing the customers have the ability to call or check online the status of the individual's payment grace period situation.

REP. BURGESS: And Mr. Rodgers, would that even pertain to you?

MR. RODGERS: Yes, similarly we have electronic means as well as a telephone service as well, providers of various types of verified coverage.

REP. BURGESS: And Mr. Matheis?

MR. MATHEIS: Yes, we provide the same service.

REP. BURGESS: And what I would ask of each of you is will you make available to the committee the type of information and how it is transferred to your providers, your doctors and hospitals when they call for that information.

And then, Mr. Chairman, further I'd like to ask unanimous consent, when the secretary was here in December, the secretary of Health and Human Services, after that hearing, I submitted a letter to the secretary with several questions that I wanted answered. They have not been answered to date. I am going to ask those same questions of our insurance representatives today. I'm going to ask those in writing and I would appreciate your response to those questions that the secretary was unwilling to answer.

REP. DEGETTE: Reserving the right to object, I would just point out that the secretary was here in front of this committee testifying three times last year and if there's questions she has not answered, we certainly will be happy to work with the majority and get those questions answered. I'll withdraw my reservation.

REP. MURPHY: Well, the members do have the right to submit questions for --

REP. BURGESS: And I will be submitting those questions in writing for our panel. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

REP. MURPHY: Mr. Green, you're now recognized for five minutes.

REPRESENTATIVE GENE GREEN (D-TX): Thank you, Chairman Murphy and Ranking Member DeGette, for having this hearing today and our wittiness for their testimony. Our district in Texas is a very urban district in Houston and has one of the highest rates of uninsured people who don't receive insurance through their employer in the country.

One of the other talking points that my Republican colleagues have seized upon last year, especially when the healthcare.gov was encountering problems early in the enrollment period, was the idea that fewer people would have health insurance following the implementation of the Affordable Care Act than did beforehand. Now, I know that all our representatives here today see that the information of how many people enrolled and their total number of customers are proprietary. And I understand that.

But you all also I would hope are familiar with the general insurance landscape and how it's changed under the Affordable Care Act. Earlier this week, the Gallup Poll released a survey examining the total number of Americans that have insurance. Mr. Pratt, are you familiar with that survey?

MR. PRATT: Generally, yes.

REP. GREEN: The Gallup Poll conducted interviews with 14,000 American adults. Gallop found that the number of adults without insurance had dropped to its lowest level since the beginning of 2008.

A drop of this magnitude correlates to more than 11 million people gaining coverage. Are you familiar enough with the poll to say that that sounds like a reasonable amount?

MR. PRATT: Congressman, I think that's what they reported. I'm not in a position to say whether that's a reasonable amount or not.

REP. GREEN: OK, OK. Anyone else on the panel want to talk about that Gallup poll, because, you know, again, these are -- these are what we're seeing and since the enrollment period ended. RAND and the Urban Institute released similar reports in March and April. Are any of you familiar with these reports.

MR. : I'm not familiar with the reports.

REP. GREEN: OK.

Well, in early April, Rand Corporation released the results of their poll, which found overall number of Americans with insurance had grown to 9.3 million as of mid-March, even before the late enrollment date surge.

The Urban Institute also released a report in the past month suggesting that millions more people have coverage than before the ACA was implemented.

My question of any of our witnesses: Would you agree that the findings of these, whether it be Rand, Gallup or the Urban Institute, are consistent with millions of Americans signing up for health insurance? Did y'all experience that with your companies during the sign-up that they selected your company as part of the -- if you happened to be part of the exchange, both national or the state exchanges?

MR. : Congressman, we do not have at one point -- we do not have enough information at this point to know how many uninsured are actually among the enrollees because that data is -- we just don't have access to that data at this point.

REP. GREEM: OK. Well, generally the ACA has led to a huge increase in coverage. Even without the polls, we've seen some of the numbers. And is that -- can you verify that with your companies, whether it be Wellpoint, Blue Cross? Have you seen that increase in the number of people who have signed up with your companies since the deadline?

MR. RODGERS: Speaking for Health Care Service Corporation, I've provided in my written testimony as well as in my opening comments the number of people that we signed up on and off exchanges during the open enrollment period. I can't tell you today how many of those came from the ranks of the uninsured or from our competitors or either from a prior policy with one of our five Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans, but we're certainly happy to have the membership.

REP. GREEN: OK. Well, and we understand the -- there were people who were using the websites and the national exchange to shop. And I had some companies who said, I'm a small business, I encourage -- in fact I have a number of them in my area. He said, we have actually helped our employees sign up individually because, you know, you have 10 employees -- they weren't required but the actually used it. So -- and I know that's an analogy but I've heard that from a lot of my employers.

Now, I know my Republican colleagues with the missed data from these polls that -- anything that comes through the administration on the overall sign-up. In March, Speaker Boehner said that there were less people today with health insurance than there were before this law went into effect, I think not even basing on a poll. Would y'all agree that there are more people in -- that have health insurance now, let's say, since May 1st than we had before the ACA?

MR. : I can't speak to numbers on that enrollment.

REP. : I don't know how my colleagues continue to make unfounded claims in the face of the clear evidence that the Affordable Care Act is providing millions of Americans with health care coverage. It makes me wonder what would possibly convince them that millions of Americans have gained coverage under the law. I suspect that ultimately once the information becomes so indisputable it will -- maybe will change the subject and rather concede that clearly people have health insurance as a result of the ACA.

And having served many years in Congress and even before that in the state legislature in Texas, no law Congress ever passes is perfect. That's not how our forefathers created this system. So we do need to go back, like our ranking member said, and see what we can do to fix the ACA. And I appreciate y'all's efforts to help us do that once we get to that point.

And I'll yield back my time.

REP. MURPHY: The gentleman yields back.

Now recognize Mr. Griffith of Virginia for five minutes.

REPRESENTATIVE MORGAN GRIFFITH (R-VA): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. Thank you all for being here.

Ms. Blackburn asked you earlier for a show of hands; I'm going to do the same. If your company anticipates a reduction for the average family that you ensure of $2,500 or more, would you raise your hand? (Pause.)

If your company anticipates a reduction in premium of $2,000 per average family for your subscribers, raise your hand. (Pause.)

Same for $1,500. (Pause.)

All right. I appreciate that.

When will your companies submit their rates to the administration for 2015? Do y'all have a date that you're going to do that by? Yes?

MR. : I believe the rates are due by -- toward the end of June. I believe it's June 27th. I think that some of the states are a little bit ahead of that.

REP. GRIFFITH: All right. And do you know when those will become public?

MR. : Depending on the market, sir, that will vary, depending on the states.

REP. GRIFFITH: All right. And when you submit those to the administration, will you commit today to submitting those rates to us as well?

MR. : I'm not involved in the rate submission process, but to the extent that's possible -- I'll need to talk with our company representatives about that.

REP. GRIFFITH: Well, I certainly can't see how it would be illegal to share information with the United States Congress, but --

MR. : (Inaudible.)

REP. GRIFFITH: But if possible you will do it, Mr. Rodgers?

MR. RODGERS: I need to confirm with our actuaries who are involved with the rate filing process because I'm not --

MR. : We're happy to work with this committee as long -- as long as the rates remain proprietary until they do become public and then all of our competitors see them.

REP. GRIFFITH: All right. That's certainly fair.

Any others? Mr. Wingle?

MR. WINGLE: I'd have to take that under advisement about how we share rates.

REP. GRIFFITH: Mr. Evanko?

MR. EVANKO: I'd just say that the rates are very competitively sensitive for obvious reasons, so we want to make sure that it's a level playing field at the time any rates are disclosed.

REP. GRIFFITH: Have either you or anyone in your organizations -- and again, it's for all of you all -- engaged in discussions with the administration already about the 2015 rates?

MR. : Not that I'm aware of

MR. : No.

MR. : Not to my knowledge.

REP. GRIFFITH: Everyone is silent. Does that mean there have been none? Anybody had any discussions with the administration about rates for 2015?

MR. : None that I'm aware of.

REP. GRIFFITH: OK.

MR. : No.

MR. : No.

REP. GRIFFITH: All right. Appreciate that. Thank you very much.

Mr. Pratt, the ACA includes a tax credit for small businesses to purchase health insurance coverage for employees. It also levees a tax on health insurance purchased by small businesses. On the one hand we give the employers a tax credit to make health insurance more affordable, and then we turn around with the other hand and we tax those policies. Does that not seem as an inherent conflict in policy view?

MR. PRATT: Congressman, we've expressed significant concerns with the new tax on small businesses and individuals that total some hundred billion dollars that will largely be passed on to them in the form of higher premiums.

REP. GRIFFITH: And what we're trying to do, of course, is to see if we can't keep premiums down, and ACA -- "Obamacare" has failed to meet its promise of the $2,500 reduction for the average family. That's pretty straightforward, isn't it?

MR. PRATT: Congressman, we do believe that the health insurance tax runs counter to the goal of providing more affordable coverage.

REP. GRIFFITH: And as a part of this, we're actually taxing government itself. We've got federal programs including Medicare Advantage, Medicaid Managed Care. The federal government is in fact taxing itself with the tax that you spoke of earlier through its subsidization of Medicare and in part Medicaid, and then state governments are also having to pay the tax. Do you have any idea how much that tax is on the American people? You said a hundred billion (dollars) in increase, but how much for the federal and state governments?

MR. PRATT: Congressman, I don't have that information handy, but we did commission a study by Oliver Wyman that does break out that information in more detail, including on a state-by-state basis, and we'd be happy to make that available.

REP. GRIFFITH: All right. I'd appreciate that if you would.

Also in your testimony you write that insurers have many duplicate enrollments because of the problems with healthcare.gov. And I can tell you that we had that in both -- I've heard it from constituents and in our family. Apparently we didn't push the right button the first time around -- I say we; my wife did it all. I don't want to take on any assumptions that it was us doing it. It was my wife working over the computer for hours and hours, but actually submitted several different applications -- ended up with one. How widespread is that problem for citizens out there, and is that part of the confusion between whether or not people have paid their premiums or not?

MR. PRATT: Congressman, the challenge you referred to I think was presented as a result of the problems with the website and the technology. And anecdotally we have heard from our members about a number of duplicate enrollments. I don't have an order of magnitude on that other than to note that it has been a problem and an issue.

REP. GRIFFITH: All right. I appreciate that.

And Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

REP. MURPHY: The gentleman yields back.

Now recognize Ms. Schakowsky for five minutes.

REPRESENTATIVE JAN SCHAKOWSKY (D-IL): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

This morning the Democratic committee staff released a memorandum on the amazing number of distortions and false claims that Republicans have made about the Affordable Care Act. It's a deplorable record. Virtually every major prediction or claim made by the Republicans about the ACA since 2009 turned out to be wrong.

Today we have the benefit of hearing from some of the companies that are actually working on the Affordable Care Act in the real world. These companies were not the biggest supporters of the law. They still oppose many provisions, but they do not live in the Republican echo chamber. They live in the real world, and I hope they can provide some clarity on a few questions.

The first question I have for all of you is whether the ACA is a government takeover of health care. Republicans have made that claim I don't know how many times. By one count the phrase appeared on Speaker Boehner's website 90 different places. It's mentioned on the RNC, Republican National Committee, website 200 times. Days before Affordable Care Act's passage in 2010, then-House Minority Leader John Boehner's office wrote that, quote, "Democrats have opted for a government takeover of health care."

So, Mr. Wingle, the ACA is now in effect.

Has the government nationalized Aetna, or is it still a for-profit corporation?

MR. WINGLE: We are a publicly traded for-profit corporation.

REP. SCHAKOWSKY: And Mr. Evanko, what about you? Has Cigna been taken over by the federal government?

MR. EVANKO: No. We're a for-profit organization.

REP. SCHAKOWSKY: Mr. Rodgers, Mr. Matheis, have your companies been nationalized, or are they still non-profits?

MR. RODGERS: We're a not-for-profit mutual legal reserve company.

MR. MATHEIS: We're actually a for-profit organization.

REP. SCHAKOWSKY: Oh, you're for-profit.

MR. MATHEIS: Yes.

REP. SCHAKOWSKY: Sorry. (Laughs.)

Mr. Pratt, you work for the trade group that represents the private insurance industry. Is there still a private insurance industry, or has the industry been destroyed or taken over by the government, as Republicans predicted?

MR. PRATT: There is still a private industry, and we represent many of those companies.

REP. SCHAKOWSKY: Thank you.

Republicans also questioned whether the private health insurance -- whether private health insurance would even exist in 2014. In 2010, Senator Coburn said, quote, "There will be no insurance industry left in three years," and that, quote, "private health insurance will be dead in three years," unquote.

I should note that nearly four years have passed since that statement was made. Mr. Pratt, is the private industry, health industry, dead?

MR. PRATT: Representative, no.

REP. SCHAKOWSKY: Does anybody else on the panel believe that private industry has disappeared? Private insurance industry. Thank you.

Republicans have also claimed that Americans will no longer be able to see their doctors because of the ACA. Mr. Wingle, does your company health care plan -- do the plans cover physician care?

MR. WINGLE: They do.

REP. SCHAKOWSKY: And Mr. Evanko, what about you? Does Cigna have doctors in its health care plans?

MR. EVANKO: Yes, we do.

REP. SCHAKOWSKY: Mr. Rodgers, what about HCSC? Do you include doctors in your networks?

MR. RODGERS: Certainly.

REP. SCHAKOWSKY: And Mr. Matheis, what about WellPoint?

MR. MATHEIS: Yes, we cover physician services.

REP. SCHAKOWSKY: Thank you. Thank you very much.

Republicans have claimed that nobody would sign up for coverage. They claim that huge numbers have not paid for coverage. Eight million people have signed up for coverage on the exchanges.

Millions more have coverage outside the exchanges. And each of the insurance companies here today have testified that people have signed up in droves, and upwards of 80 or 90 percent have paid their premiums.

Mr. Chairman, I don't know if there will ever come a day when Republicans will admit their criticisms of the ACA have been unfounded. I think we may have reached a turning point last week when you released your misleading report on the Affordable Care Act enrollment. I think the American public finally realize that Republicans have absolutely no credibility on this issue. You cannot be this wrong this many times and still expect to be taken seriously.

One commentator, Ezra Klein, even gave the Republican behavior a name, "Obamacare" derangement syndrome. He defined it as, and I quote, "the acute inability to see 'Obamacare' as anything but a catastrophic failure that the American people will soon reject. For those suffering from ODS, all bad 'Obamacare' news is good news and all good 'Obamacare' news is spin. In this world, delays of minor provisions in the law prove that the entire structure is collapsing, while surges of millions of people enrolling in insurance don't prove anything at all.

Mr. Chairman, perhaps we can ask our panel of insurers if their policies cover "Obamacare" derangement syndrome. But really that's rhetorical. And I yield back. Thank you.

REP. MURPHY: But it would be important to know if that's a preexisting condition. Then I think it's not coverable.

REP. DEGETTE (?): It would be covered now. Good news, Mr. Chairman. (Laughter.)

REP. MURPHY: Depends what the death panel says, I think. (Laughter.)

Mr. Olson is now recognized for five minutes.

REPRESENTATIVE PETE OLSON (R-TX): I thank the chair.

And welcome to our witnesses.

I wish you weren't here, but you are here. You're here because the administration would not give us the information we need to educate our constituents about "Obamacare" and the rollout of HealthCare.gov.

I want to talk about all of the questions about the back end and the money you're supposed to be getting from the exchange (and ?) the information.

In your experiences, is it working? Mr. Pratt, is the back end working? Do you get what you need from HealthCare.gov?

MR. PRATT: Representative, throughout the open-enrollment period, we worked very closely to develop workarounds, manual processes and other things that were necessary to make the system work better. It's my understanding that while the back-end problems have improved, some remain.

REP. OLSON: Workarounds. You guys stepped up to the plate to work around the disaster of the health care exchange rollout. Is that what you're trying to say? I mean, you guys took it upon yourselves instead of depending on what -- they got information. You depend upon them. And it's sort of trickling out, just coming slowly, slowly, slowly, not what you need. Is that what you're saying? You guys stepped around to make that happen?

MR. PRATT: Representative, I think what I would say is that we kept the interests of our members squarely in mind in terms of minimizing disruption for them. And our members did what was necessary to make sure that it was as soon as it possibly could be.

REP. OLSON: Mr. Coyne?

MR. COYNE: I would agree with Mr. Pratt. There are still back- end issues to be worked through, (but ?) that we are working with CMS on those. CMS has called a meeting of health insurers in the federal marketplace on May 20th to consider some of those back-end issues and try and find solutions to them.

REP. OLSON: I hope you'll keep us apprised of what that meeting puts forth; give us that information, because we're not getting it from the Obama administration.

Mr. Wingle.

MR. WINGLE: We've worked closely to share our concerns about technical needs and helped work with the industry through our trade association with colleagues to recommend and -- recommend prioritization on fixes for back-end issues, whether they're data- cleanup issues or other issues related to the back end of the exchange.

REP. OLSON: Mr. Evanko?

MR. EVANKO: There are certainly more manual processes than we anticipated prior to the exchanges launching. I'd say there have been improvements in some areas. The one back-end issue that we're most focused on is the APTC payments coming from CMS to us as a carrier. That's a manual process today. We have been getting the payments we've been requesting, though, as it relates to the APTC.

REP. OLSON: Manual process; 21st century manual process.

Mr. Rodgers?

MR. RODGERS: We're continuing to work with the enrollment process to make sure that any of the members that have selected one of our five Blue Cross and Blue Shield plans get the information they need from us, and ultimately the care they need.

REP. OLSON: Mr. Matheis.

MR. MATHEIS: Yes, we've seen significant improvement, but we still have a number of opportunities for improvement as we move through the remainder of this year.

REP. OLSON: And one final question for all the panelists. Is the website fixed? Mr. Pratt, if it's not fixed, when will it be fixed?

MR. PRATT: Representative, I don't work in the operations area. I think if the back-end issues are considered part of the website, I would suggest --

REP. OLSON: They are.

MR. PRATT: -- that there are still issues outstanding that we're working on.

REP. OLSON: Not fixed.

Mr. Coyne.

MR. COYNE: There are still issues on the back end.

REP. OLSON: Another one not fixed.

Mr. Wingle.

MR. WINGLE: There's still work to be done.

REP. OLSON: Not fixed.

Mr. Evanko.

MR. EVANKO: I can't comment on the end-to-end process. I can only comment on the component when CMS sends us enrollment transactions. And there's still work to do before that's 100 percent.

REP. OLSON: Not fixed.

Mr. Rodgers.

REP. RODGERS: We're still working with the files that we get. And I think there could be some improvement.

REP. OLSON: Still not fixed.

Mr. Matheis.

MR. MATHEIS: Yes, to echo my colleagues' statements, we still have opportunities for improvement.

REP. OLSON: Six for six, all not fixed.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time.

REP. MURPHY: (Off mic) -- now recognize Mr. Tonko for five minutes.

REPRESENTATIVE PAUL TONKO (D-NY): Thank you, Mr. Chair.

So much of the debate we have with our Republican colleagues about the Affordable Care Act comes down to one simple question: Is it a good thing for Americans to have access to quality health insurance? You would think this is a simple question. Every Republican member of the committee has health insurance. I'd bet that every pundit who makes a living attacking the ACA has health insurance. They all make certain their children have health insurance. I bet they wouldn't dream of going without it for an extended period of time.

Two big reasons these people make sure they have coverage is that it can help them stay healthy and it can prevent catastrophic medical bills that can lead to financial ruin. But this week we got clear evidence from Massachusetts that health insurance actually saves lives. Researchers at the Harvard School of Public Health looked at mortality rates in Massachusetts and in surrounding states.

My question, Mr. Pratt, is that in 2006 Massachusetts passed major health reform legislation. Is that not correct?

MR. PRATT: Yes, that's correct.

REP. TONKO: And did that coverage expansion bear some significant similarities to the Affordable Care Act, including an individual mandate, expanded Medicaid coverage, and insurance exchanges?

MR. PRATT: Generally, I would say that's fair to say.

REP. TONKO: Thank you. The Harvard researchers found that following health care reform in Massachusetts, mortality rates dropped significantly compared to surrounding states. The death rate from treatable illnesses like cancer and heart disease declined even faster.

These findings are truly remarkable: nearly a 5-percent drop in mortality from preventable illnesses. They found that for every 830 individuals who gained coverage, one life was saved. Extrapolating that onto the national scene, if the trend holds, it means that ACA will save tens of thousands of lives.

I'm not going to ask the witnesses to comment on the specifics of that study, but these witnesses know the value that health insurance provides.

Mr. Matheis, do you have any doubt that your health insurance plans cover life-saving treatments?

MR. MATHEIS: No, they do, sir.

REP. TONKO: Mr. Evanko, what about you? Do you help members access life-saving treatments?

MR. EVANKO: Absolutely.

REP. TONKO: Thank you.

And Mr. Rodgers, Mr. Wingle, what about your plans?

MR. : As a health care company, we are proud of providing consumers with high-quality plans, competitively priced. We're very proud of that.

MR. : Yes, sir, I agree.

REP. TONKO: Thank you for your affirmative answers. Thank you. I think Republicans are really outside of the mainstream when they try to argue that Americans aren't better off if they have health insurance coverage. Their tireless efforts to discourage people from getting covered are truly shameful.

Even more shameful is the refusal of Republican governors and some legislatures to expand the Medicaid program. Doing that would provide millions of Americans with health care coverage. And the Harvard study indicates that doing so would save thousands of lives.

So we thank you for your affirmative answers.

I yield back.

REP. MURPHY: Gentleman yields back.

Now we'll recognize Mr. Gardner for five minutes.

REPRESENTATIVE CORY GARDNER (R-CO): Thank you, Mr. Chairman, and thank you to the witnesses for being here today and your time.

Last year the president apologized for his broken promise -- if you like your plan, you can keep your plan -- after millions of Americans received plan cancellations. I'd like each insurer to reply in turn how many plans did you cancel or discontinue last year because of "Obamacare".

Mr. Coyne.

MR. COYNE: We don't have that information at the association. Individual health plans have that information.

REP. GARDNER: Mr. Wingle.

MR. WINGLE: We can provide that information to the committee.

REP. GARDNER: Could you submit that for the record and by state with the total for all of you?

Mr. Evanko.

MR. EVANKO: Sure, yes.

REP. GARDNER: Do you have the number of the top of your head right now?

MR. EVANKO: I can give you approximations that I've heard.

REP. GARDNER: Sure. That'd be great.

MR. EVANKO: We had approximately 2,000 customers, individual customers, in South Carolina and Connecticut.

REP. GARDNER: Mr. Wingle.

MR. WINGLE: Again, we want to get you the firm data.

REP. GARDNER: OK. Mr. Rodgers.

MR. RODGERS: I don't have that data with me. I think we've provided it to other congressional committees, so we'd certainly be happy --

REP. GARDNER: But that's not a number that you keep on the top of your head?

MR. RODGERS: Not at all.

REP. GARDNER: OK. Mr. Matheis.

MR. MATHEIS: I don't have the number of products off the top of my head, but we'd be happy to provide that --

REP. GARDNER: Yeah, if you could submit for the record by state and with the total, I'd appreciate it.

Then to AHIP, does your organization know how many plan cancellations there were nationwide last year or for your members?

MR. PRATT: Congressman, we would not have that information.

REP. GARDNER: Your -- you don't ask that of your members? They don't provide that to you?

MR. PRATT: To my knowledge, we did not, no.

REP. GARDNER: OK. Mr. Coyne, does your organization know how many member plans were canceled? You don't?

MR. COYNE: We haven't asked for that information either.

REP. GARDNER: In order to avoid these cancellations, some insurers offered early renewal plans so that they could continue into 2014. If each of the insurers could reply in turn how many plans did you offer early renewals to last year that would have been otherwise canceled?

Mr. Matheis.

MR. MATHEIS: We offered early renewals to all of our customers in all 14 states. That was allowable. So California did not allow us to offer early renewal, but in the majority of every other market, we offered it to every customer.

REP. GARDNER: Mr. Rodgers.

MR. RODGERS: We offered early renewals in four of our five states. The Montana plan became part of our larger --

REP. GARDNER: And how many -- how many were those offers -- how many offers were there?

MR. RODGERS: I don't have the number with me, but they're significant numbers, yes.

REP. GARDNER: And could you provide -- all of you provide those for the record and by state, breaking it down, please?

Mr. Evanko.

MR. EVANKO: Yes, we offered early renewal to about 235,000 customers in all states except for Connecticut and South Carolina, as I had testified earlier.

REP. GARDNER: OK. And Mr. Wingle.

MR. WINGLE: We offered early renewals as consistent with state laws and regulations.

REP. GARDNER: OK. Last year president apologized -- President Obama apologized for these canceled plans and offered a one-year delay of enforcing the "Obamacare" requirements that led to the cancelations. This delay has since been extended.

I'd like each insurer to answer, how many plans do you currently offer that do not meet the law's requirements but you are able to continue offering because of this delay?

Mr. Matheis.

MR. MATHEIS: I would have to get you that number, sir. I don't know it off the top of my head.

REP. GARDNER: Mr. Rodgers.

MR. RODGERS: Yeah, I don't know the number.

REP. GARDNER: Mr. Evanko.

MR. EVANKO: I don't know the exact figure either.

REP. GARDNER: Mr. Wingle.

MR. WINGLE: I don't have the hard numbers on the pre-ACA plans.

REP. GARDNER: To AHIP, do you know how many plans your member organizations correctly offer under this delay?

MR. PRATT: Could you please repeat that question?

REP. GARDNER: The question is, the one-year delay of enforcing "Obamacare" requirements that led to the cancellation -- this delay has been extended -- how many plans do you currently offer that do not meet the law's requirements but you're able to continue offering because of this delay?

MR. PRATT: We don't have that information.

REP. GARDNER: (Inaudible) -- that number?

Mr. Coyne.

MR. COYNE: The only information we have has been informally reported to us, and it contains all non-ACA-compliant plans across the Blue system, and that number is 3.2 million.

REP. GARDNER: Mr. Matheis, what happens when those plans -- when the time runs out, when the delay expires?

MR. MATHEIS: So, depending on how the state handles it, with the extension, in theory a customer could sign up for two more years --

REP. GARDNER: What happens after that time expires?

MR. MATHEIS: Then they would be moved to an ACA product.

REP. GARDNER: So that plan would be canceled?

MR. MATHEIS: Yes, sir.

REP. GARDNER: Mr. Rodgers, would that plan be canceled at the end of the time period?

MR. RODGERS: Mr. Matheis' characterization was correct, I believe.

REP. GARDNER: So, yes, that's a cancellation after the time expires.

Mr. Evanko, would those plans be canceled after the time expired?

MR. EVANKO: Based on the current guidance, yes.

REP. GARDNER: Mr. Wingle, would those plans be canceled after the time expires?

MR. WINGLE: Where feasible, we would offer the member an ACA- compliant alternative.

REP. GARDNER: Could you submit the total numbers for all of those plans that would be canceled when the time expires, break it down by state, please? Thank you.

And one of the excuses that we've heard from the supporters of the health care bill is that the law didn't do this, didn't cause the cancellations, that you were the ones who planned the cancellations and planned all the cancellations. Were the massive cancellation notices sent last year the ones the president apologized for -- were these because of "Obamacare" or because of you?

Mr. Matheis.

MR. MATHEIS: The law required us to send out those cancellations.

REP. GARDNER: So "Obamacare" required the cancellations.

Mr. Rodgers.

MR. RODGERS: The law required us to in certain situations --

REP. GARDNER: So "Obamacare" caused and required the cancellations.

Mr. Evanko.

MR. EVANKO: We had such a fraction of our book of business -- that was not offered, early renewals, but that was --

REP. GARDNER: But "Obamacare" required the 2,000 cancellations that you said?

MR. EVANKO: In the two states where we did not offer early renewals.

REP. GARDNER: Mr. Wingle, did "Obamacare" cause the cancellations?

MR. WINGLE: Plans that weren't compliant with the benefit requirements of the law were canceled.

REP. GARDNER: So that's a yes?

MR. WINGLE: That is a yes.

REP. GARDNER: In attempting to pass this law, the president said repeatedly, if you like your plan, you can keep it. Did that turn out to be true for all of your customers?

Mr. --

MR. : No, that was not true for a hundred percent of our customers.

REP. GARDNER: Mr. Rodgers.

REP. : Time's over.

MR. RODGERS: Not for 100 percent.

REP. GARDNER: Mr. Evanko.

MR. EVANKO: For over 99 percent of our customers, that was the case.

REP. GARDNER: Mr. Wingle.

MR. WINGLE: Not in all cases, no.

REP. GARDNER: OK. I appreciate your time, and I yield back.

REP. MURPHY: Thank you.

Now recognize Ms. Castor for five minutes.

REPRESENTATIVE KATHY CASTOR (D-FL): Well, thank you very much, and good morning. And thank you, Mr. Chairman, for calling this hearing to discuss the strong enrollment numbers of the Affordable Care Act. When the enrollment numbers were released last week, coming from the state of Florida, we were floored. About 1 million Floridians signed up under the Affordable Care Act. This far exceeded our expectations. We thought 600,000, 700,000. But get to about a million signed up that doesn't include the about 300,000 children that signed up under children's health insurance or our disabled neighbors, children under Medicaid. And then I learned from our Florida Blue executives Friday -- Florida Blue's the market leader in Florida -- that that million-dollar figure does not include others that signed up for -- with private health insurance companies, so that's -- add on another probably couple hundred thousand.

It's really remarkable, and it has far exceeded our expectations. So I really -- you know, I just think about all of my neighbors all across the state that are breathing easier because now they have financial security in their lives that they did not have before. And I want to thank all of our navigators, the insurance brokers, many of the insurance companies that were out providing information, all of our community outreach partners. You have made a fundamental difference in the lives of millions of Floridians. And it's going to be very meaningful for them and their families.

It's also good news for neighbors that have insurance already. Most people across America already have insurance. And if you have insurance, what you want most of all is that you want other people to have insurance, because the cost of these high premium increases and rates -- rate increases over time were largely caused by this huge uninsured population, and those costs, when they show up at the hospital for health care, they have to be paid somewhere.

So that's what we're hoping then. And we've heard time and time again the scare tactics here, and we will -- we'll see what happens with premium increases. But do we want to go back to the double-digit consistent premium increases of the past? I don't think so. So this is the way that hopefully over time we will be able to stabilize the marketplace.

And I think my colleague Congressman Tonko was right.

I think my Republican friends now are in danger of sounding like they are opposed to people taking personal responsibility and having health insurance. People need to have health insurance to maintain their quality of life, to make sure they don't go bankrupt. And I would hope that my Republican friends could now turn the page and we could get to work on many of the complicated issues with health policy in America.

Now, one of my Republican colleagues' favorite attacks on health care reform is that it will cause people to lose their doctors. Now, you have to say, OK, even in Florida, where you have over a million people now that have -- now have health insurance, they're going to be able to see a doctor, 8 million nationwide. But this is especially bizarre coming from Republicans because they have long opposed any policy proposals to broaden networks. They have fought efforts to increase the reimbursement for primary care providers who serve Medicare and Medicaid patients.

What has been lost in this debate is the fact that the ACA set important new network adequacy standards that guarantee access to key essential community providers. It ensures that no consumer will ever see a huge out-of-network bill if they are taken to an emergency room. And it gives consumers strong appeal rights. It's a huge step forward in patient access. Mr. Pratt, can you give us some context here? Providers and insurance regulatory negotiate rates and determine who will be inside of a network. Isn't that correct?

MR. PRATT: Representative, yes, that's correct.

REP. CASTOR: And if insurers had to include every provider in their network, wouldn't that eliminate their bargaining power and substantially increase premiums?

MR. PRATT: Congresswoman, I think that is generally correct. I wouldn't characterize the amount of the increase but it is a very important aspect of keeping premiums affordable.

REP. CASTOR: OK. Can these high value networks improve care coordination and move us towards a system where we pay for quality rather than quantity in our health care system?

MR. PRATT: Absolutely. Our members are working very hard toward that end.

REP. CASTOR: See, I think this network adequacy in the marketplace is an important issue. We need to make sure that consumers have access to providers in their area and that they have enough choices to get the care that they need when they need it. Republicans should not attack the ACA for letting the private market work.

And remember, personal responsibility is fundamental. It's a fundamental tenet of the Affordable Care Act and it's oftentimes the customer's responsibility to review all of the choices they have, whether it's bronze, silver, gold, platinum and the network contained therein and make their own choice. So the law sets key new standards and provides important protections but insurers and providers will continue to negotiate to ensure sufficient access at fair prices. Thank you very much. I yield back.

REP. BURGESS: The gentlelady yields back. The chair recognizes the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. Johnson, for five minutes for your questions please.

REPRESENTATIVE BILL JOHNSON (R-OH): Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Wow. So much to talk about, so little time to talk about it all. Gentlemen, thank you for joining us today. You know, one of the reasons this committee has requested -- has requested this information from you is because the administration has refused repeatedly to provide any data on who is actually paying for the Affordable Care Act.

In fact, one White House spokesman told reporters to ask your industry for this information. Do you -- so here's the question for you. Do you currently provide any information to the administration on who has paid for their plan? If yes, what information do you provide and how is it provided and how often? Do you provide any information to the administration?

MR. WINGLE: The only information we provide around payment is related to the invoicing we do with the government to get the premium tax credit.

REP. JOHNSON: And how is it provided and how often?

MR. WINGLE: It's the process we described earlier. It's a workaround process because the financial management module is not fully constructed on the FFM.

REP. JOHNSON: And who do you send it to, Mr. Wingle?

MR. WINGLE: Send it to CMS.

REP. JOHNSON: OK. Well, for -- it's a little confusing. So the administration will pay your industry a subsidy for potential customers who never even effectuate their enrollment. So if you're not providing the details to the administration on who's paying for the Affordable Care Act, how are they paying you? How are they -- what are they basing their payments to you on?

MR. WINGLE: I'd only make one clarification. We do not submit information for payment from the government for members who are not effectuated, who haven't made their own portion of the binder payment. We do not do that.

REP. JOHNSON: Well, let me dig a little deeper then. So how do you get paid? How do you get paid and what is that based on? What information do you provide the government, the administration that gets you paid?

MR. WINGLE: The process essentially works because we have the enrollment file information. We understand the premium for the plan selected by the consumer on that enrollment file.

REP. JOHNSON: So you're paid based on enrollment, not on actual payment?

MR. WINGLE: We understand the member's responsibility on the enrollment and the difference between the premium rate and the member responsibility tells us what the government is and we roll that figure up monthly.

REP. JOHNSON: So if you only submit for effectuated, I can't even pronounce that word, doesn't the administration know the pay rate? Don't they know how much these people are paying?

MR. : Yes, sir. They've determined the subsidy eligibility as part of the enrollment process. And so, a file would come to us. We'd bill for the member responsibility. Upon collection of that member responsibility, then we would typically if the system were working as designed, we would send a file to the government, to the exchange saying here are the members that have effectuated enrollment and here's ultimately the payment that is due to us.

REP. JOHNSON: OK. So do you believe the administration is currently able to report the payment rate or who is fully enrolled? Do you think they have that information based on what you give them?

MR. : So today the payments that are coming back and forth are estimated. So there's not been a direct reconciliation between our company and the exchange on a member-by-member basis. That's one of the works in progress that we discussed on the backend discussion we had earlier in the day, sir.

REP. JOHNSON: Considering then that the administration is able to report who selects a plan on healthcare.gov, would it be possible for them to gather information on who has actually paid for a plan? Let's start down with Mr. Pratt.

MR. PRATT: Representative, it's my understanding that that capability is not present yet.

REP. JOHNSON: Mr. Coyne?

MR. PRATT: I'm not sure whether it may be in the future.

REP. JOHNSON: OK.

MR. COYNE: Yeah, it's my understanding as well that that capability isn't ready yet.

REP. JOHNSON: Mr. Wingle?

MR. WINGLE: I don't know what the administration can infer from the data they have. But I know the financial management module itself is not available.

REP. JOHNSON: Mr. Evanko?

MR. EVANKO: One bit of color I'll add to my colleagues is the submission for APTC is only for those that are APTC-eligible. So there's also people that do not qualify for that that should be in that calculation.

REP. JOHNSON: Mr. Rodgers?

MR. RODGERS: Yes, I think my colleagues are correct in their statements and we're still working on the reconciliation process for payments.

REP. JOHNSON: OK. Mr. Matheis?

MR. MATHEIS: I would concur with earlier statements.

REP. JOHNSON: OK. Final question, does the administration know who's paid for their plan? Mr. Pratt?

MR. PRATT: Congressman, I don't know the answer to that question.

REP. JOHNSON: Mr. Coyne?

MR. COYNE: I don't know either.

MR. WINGLE: I don't know what the administration knows about the enrollment in terms of who's paid.

MR. EVANKO: I don't know either.

MR. RODGERS: No, sir.

MR. MATHEIS: No, sir.

REP. JOHNSON: It's interesting that they sent us to ask you folks. OK, Mr. Chairman, I yield back.

REP. BURGESS: The gentleman yields back his time. The chair recognizes the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Yarmuth, for five minutes for your questions please.

REPRESENTATIVE JOHN YARMUTH (D-KY): Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman. And I'm really glad we had this hearing. That's something I usually don't say very often. But this has been a very illuminating hearing because I think what it's done very clearly is to show what our colleagues' on the side side strategy is which is to try and hold a hearing in which they can grab a headline that will in some way scare the American people about what's -- about the Affordable Care Act rather than providing true information about what's going on.

And you know, it's clear from the desperation, once their initial strategy of trying to deal with this alleged failure to pay premiums, now they've moved on to trying to scare people about what premiums might increase by later either next year or in the future. So you know, and I'm glad you all stressed how important it was that you not give up your competitive position because obviously you're all competing in the markets.

And, you know, I could turn that strategy around and do the same thing and ask you speculative questions like "Will the premium increases that we are likely to see approach the 38 percent that we saw -- we were seeing in 2010, before the Affordable Care Act was passed?" and ask you to speculate on that. But I won't do that. And I would -- I could ask you about what the rate of cancellations of policies were prior to the Affordable Care Act.

And I could also ask you -- and I think this would be a fair question. I wouldn't expect you to answer -- how many of your insurance companies, because of the success of the Affordable Care Act enrollment so far and the beneficial mix of younger people, has prompted you to explore doing business in other states, as has been reported in the media? I think that would be a question that I would love to have the answer to.

I know for instance in Kentucky, the co-op -- the non-profit Kentucky co-op which is competing in the exchange is now getting ready to do business in West Virginia, because they don't have a co-op and they see an opportunity there. And I think the main co-op is planning to do business in -- I'm sorry the Massachusetts co-op in Maine, because they see an opportunity there.

So I think all these things are indications that the Affordable Care Act, far from being the train wreck which many have suggested it would become, is actually getting a lot -- deal of traction as it speeds down the tracks.

And just to put it in perspective, in Kentucky, we have -- we have insured in the period of six months roughly half of the previously uninsured population of the state. We -- 411,000 people now have coverage in Kentucky under the ACA. Three-quarters of those -- in answer to one of the questions that was asked earlier -- three- quarters of those we know previously had no insurance. And 52 percent of all that 411,000 people are under 35. So we know things are in -- working in Kentucky. And as Ms. Castor mentioned, things are surprisingly successful in Florida, despite an administration there which has done everything it could to sabotage the Affordable Care Act.

So you know, I -- we can speculate about and argue about the level of success, whether it's a success or a train wreck. But, you know, the markets certainly have had something to say about how they view the Affordable Care Act in terms of your businesses. I look at the share prices of the companies represented here, and one based in my own state -- Humana is based in my district. When the Affordable Care Act was enacted, their stock price was 44. Now it's 110. Aetna's was 33. Now it's 72. United Health Care was 27. Now it's 75. And Cigna's was 34 and now it's 83, roughly.

So the market has made a judgment, I think, about the fact that at least in terms of your business, the Affordable Care Act has offered a significant financial benefit.

So I think this -- again, this is -- one of the things that's fascinating about this hearing is we know what the Republicans have tried to do, and that's to scare the American people and to use every little indication of a problem to reflect a -- some kind of a doomsday scenario that we are looking at. And fortunately, the facts on the ground -- whether it's the marketplace, whether it's the experience in Kentucky or Florida or California where literally millions of people -- and by one estimate, 20.8 million people -- got coverage under the ACA or bought coverage because of the ACA in the private markets outside the exchanges, we are doing -- it is doing exactly what we intended it to do.

We know there have been glitches. We know there have been problems. Any undertaking of this magnitude would experience those. But again, I thank you for your participation and I thank you for this hearing.

And I yield back.

REP. BURGESS: (Off mic) -- back. The gentleman from New Mexico's recognized five minutes, Mr. Lujan, for your questions, please.

REPRESENTATIVE BEN RAY LUJAN (D-NM): Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Matheis, your company CEO said last week that the surge in enrollment in March included a higher percentage of young people than in earlier months. Isn't that correct?

MR. MATHEIS: That is correct.

REP. LUJAN: And Mr. Evanko, your CEO said something similar last week as well. Isn't that correct?

MR. EVANKO: That's correct.

REP. LUJAN: And as a general matter, all else being equal, a higher percentage of young people in the risk pool will help lower premiums. Isn't that correct?

Mr. Evanko?

MR. EVANKO: That's a complicated question. It's an important one, but it's a complicated question.

REP. LUJAN: I think that all that we've heard from all the actuaries is that the answer is yes. We need more young people in. It lowers premiums.

Mr. Pratt, insurance company premiums are market-sensitive information that companies are not eager to let their competitors know until the last minute. Isn't that correct?

MR. PRATT: Representative, it is competitively sensitive information. I don't know that I could speak to their particular perspective on that question.

REP. LUJAN: Well, it seems like they'd want to keep it to themselves as long as they're able to, so that competitors aren't able to get their hands on it and adjust accordingly. Is that correct? Is that fair?

MR. PRATT: It's fair to say it's competitively sensitive information.

REP. LUJAN: And is it correct that many insurance commissioners around the country have the authority to review rates and that the final rates consumers pay are sometimes lower than the rates that are actually filed?

MR. PRATT: Yes, Representative. Typically speaking, rates are filed with the states and the states review those rates.

REP. LUJAN: Very good. I used to sit on a regulatory body that the superintendent of insurance was under our jurisdiction. So I appreciate the answer to that, because I know what we saw when I was there as well, sir. So I'd certainly agree with that.

Is it also true that the ACA contains a series of policies -- reinsurance, risk adjustment and risk corridors -- to help mitigate potential premium increases?

MR. PRATT: Congressman, one goal of the "three Rs program" -- the so-called "three Rs program" is to stabilize premiums in the early years of implementation.

REP. LUJAN: And a final question to the panelists: Before the ACA, wasn't it common for insurance premiums to increase significantly year to year, often by double digits? Anyone?

Is there anyone that would disagree that premiums increased by more than 50 percent between 2003 and 2010?

Hearing none, I guess the answer to that is that there's agreement.

The 8 million figure only includes people who have signed up for insurance directly through the federal and state marketplaces that my colleagues are trying to dismiss. But people can also sign up for private ACA-compliant plans outside of the marketplaces. We don't have a lot of conversation about that.

Mr. Pratt, are individuals able to enroll in some of the plans the AHIP represents outside of the federal and state marketplaces?

MR. PRATT: That's correct.

REP. LUJAN: The CBO estimates that 5 million people will purchase ACA-compliant plans outside of the marketplace this year. These individuals will obtain the same protections and be a part of the same risk pools in each state as those who enrolled via the marketplaces.

Mr. Rodgers, how many of HCSC's enrollments have -- outside been -- have been outside of the marketplace?

MR. RODGERS: As I said in my opening testimony -- it was provided in written form to the committee -- I believe we had about 230,000 off-exchange applications during the open enrollment period ending April 15th.

REP. LUJAN: And about how many applicants have you received overall?

MR. RODGERS: We've received overall about 830,000 applications across our five states.

REP. LUJAN: So that sounds like it's representing about 1.2 million covered lives -- so about 28 percent of your enrollees signed up outside of the marketplaces. That's a significant number.

And I understand that payment data is not complete, but in the earlier months of this year, what percentage of individuals enrolling in plans outside of the marketplace have paid?

MR. RODGERS: In my written comments to the committee, I shared with you the on-exchange and off-exchange payment rates, because there is some difference. Typically the payment completion rates are a little bit higher off-exchange versus on-exchange. And you should have that data.

REP. LUJAN: So from what I was able to get from your testimony was that between January and April 90 to 93 percent and in May 63 percent today. And we can verify that in the -- and there -- does that sound accurate, though?

MR. RODGERS: That's correct. That's in my written comments.

REP. LUJAN: Can any of our other witnesses provide us with information on how many off-exchange enrollments they have had to date? If not, if you could -- Mr. Evanko?

MR. EVANKO: We have approximately 40,000 off-exchange ACA enrollments. That's about one-third of our total ACA-compliant book.

REP. LUJAN: And what I'd like to do is ask our witnesses if they'd be willing to provide the committee with detailed information on their off-exchange enrollments. Would that be okay with everyone?

MR. : Yes.

MR. : Yes.

REP. LUJAN: Very good. I appreciate that.

And, you know, later on today, we're going to be having some other hearings in other areas. Despite the demonization and demagoguing of the Affordable Care Act, over 8 million enrollees -- can you imagine what it would have been if Democrats and Republicans would have worked together to fix issues that needed fixing, if we were able to get more people covered? Who knows where that number would have been?

But later on today, we're going to be having a hearing on taking away someone's Fifth Amendment rights. We have my colleagues that are still refusing to release 39 interview transcripts on an IRS hearing. There's going to be other hearings -- another request on a hearing with Benghazi, even though there's been seven other hearings, 50 repeal attempts on the Affordable Care Act. I think there's a lot of important, pressing business that we of the Congress need to get our hands around.

And I'm certainly hopeful that in the history and tradition of this committee -- with all that I've learned from our senior members -- there once upon a time was an effort for us to work together and get along. And I certainly hope that those days return. Every time I'm home, that's what we hear.

So to all the witnesses that are here today, thank you so much, Chairman, again for you being here as well and the hearing being brought together today. An important conversation, I hope, that we're able to bring more facts into the debate. Thank you very much.

REP. BURGESS: Gentleman's time has expired. The chair recognizes Ranking Member DeGette for a follow-up.

REP. DEGETTE: Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to follow up on Mr. Lujan's questioning with the off-exchange enrollments because as we've learned there have been a number of off-exchange enrollments as -- in addition to the enrollments in the ACA and the -- both in the federal exchange and the state exchanges. So I would ask unanimous consent.

The committee has made a request of 160 plans, including plans from this panel here, that they provide information about enrollment figures and premium payments for those plans that are under the Affordable Care Act -- the exchanges. I would ask also if we would ask those same plans for that same information on the off-exchange enrollments similar to the -- to the data that we got from Blue Cross Blue Shield. Be helpful to know how many off-exchange enrollments we have had from these 160 plans and what the premium payments have been. So I'd ask unanimous consent that we also ask for that information.

REP. BURGESS: Without objection. The gentlelady yields back. Recognize myself for follow-up and I would just say on the off- enrollment, I'm one of those members. I actually had both Blue Cross Blue Shield and HealthCare.gov on hold, or they had me on hold, on December 23rd and December 24th and it was kind of a race to see who would have a live person answer the phone first. I think, if I recall correctly, Blue Cross won out that day. So I was probably an off- exchange enrollment. So you may count me as that.

I'd just like to ask each of you in follow-up, many of the products you're offering are only affordable because the government subsidizes part of the premium cost. Do you know what percentage of the plans with paid premiums (and ?) effectuated enrollment received some form of subsidy from the taxpayer? Mr. Coyne, I'll start with you and then we'll just go down the line.

MR. COYNE: We don't have that information at this point.

REP. BURGESS: Would you provide it for the record?

MR. COYNE: Yes, we'd be happy to, when we get it.

REP. BURGESS: Mr. Wingle.

MR. WINGLE: Our experience probably comports with generally available published information on that. It's the majority of our membership.

REP. BURGESS: And, again, can I ask you to submit that for the record? Mr. Evanko.

MR. EVANKO: For on-exchange customers, 80 to 85 percent are eligible for APTC.

REP. BURGESS: Mr. Rodgers.

MR. RODGERS: Yes. I believe we submitted that information, if I understood your question, in the two submissions for April and with the May 20th submission we'll provide something similar.

MR. : As did we.

REP. BURGESS: Mr. Matheis.

MR. MATHEIS: Yes. As you know, that number is a moving target but it is around 79 percent for us.

REP. BURGESS: And will you do your best to give us an accurate representation for the -- for the record? What about a situation where an individual enrolls but then cancels their plan? Are you only paid the subsidy monthly or would you be responsible for returning a portion of the subsidy throughout the year? Mr. Coyne, let's start with you.

MR. COYNE: We don't have that information.

REP. BURGESS: And will you submit that for the record?

MR. COYNE: Yes.

REP. BURGESS: Will you try to find that for us? Mr. Wingle.

MR. WINGLE: Could you repeat the question please, Mr. Chairman?

REP. BURGESS: A situation where an individual enrolls but then cancels their plan -- are you only paid the subsidy monthly or would you be responsible for returning the portion throughout the year?

MR. WINGLE: Returning the portion of premium paid or --

REP. BURGESS: The advanced premium tax credit.

MR. WINGLE: The subsidy -- the subsidy, you know, under the three-month grace period rules we retain until cancellation.

REP. BURGESS: So you would not be required to return that?

MR. WINGLE: No. Not until a member is cancelled.

REP. BURGESS: If the member just simply doesn't pay -- they make their first payment, maybe their second payment and then they stop, at the end of that three-month grace period do you have to return the money for those months where they didn't -- the patient didn't pay?

MR. WINGLE: In compliance with the three-month grace period rules, we retain any premium tax credit received during the period to cover -- help us cover -- (inaudible) -- any claims experience we had during the time the member was enrolled.

REP. BURGESS: So you retain the advanced premium tax credit?

MR. WINGLE: According with the design of the rules, yes.

REP. BURGESS: Mr. Evanko.

MR. EVANKO: Well, at the end of the 90-day grace period if the individual has not paid any more premiums then we owe that money back to CMS and we credit that in the next month's reconciliation process.

REP. BURGESS: It's interesting. Mr. Rodgers.

MR. RODGERS: I'm not familiar with that particular aspect of the grace period payments in terms of the return or not. But my -- I believe that we're only entitled to the money that's -- for the time the policy is in effect.

REP. BURGESS: And Mr. Matheis.

MR. MATHEIS: That's my understanding as well, sir.

REP. BURGESS: Mr. Coyne, do you know -- do you know how much your company has been paid in advanced premium tax credits?

MR. COYNE: Blue Cross and Blue Shield Association does not actually sponsor any of the products that are on the exchanges. Our member plans do. So we wouldn't be paid premiums or APTC.

REP. BURGESS: Mr. Evanko.

MR. EVANKO: We've received four payments so far for the months of January through April and it's in the range of 30 (million dollars) to $40 million.

REP. BURGESS: Mr. Wingle.

MR. WINGLE: We, obviously, have that data. We can supply the committee with that data.

REP. BURGESS: And that -- (inaudible) -- submit that for the record, Mr. Rodgers?

MR. RODGERS: We've received some payments. I don't know the value of the payments to date.

REP. BURGESS: And will you find that information and submit it for the record, please?

MR. RODGERS: Certainly.

REP. BURGESS: And Mr. Matheis.

MR. MATHEIS: Yes. I don't have that number ready today but we'd be happy to get it for you.

REP. BURGESS: The metal plans -- you're all familiar with them. Keep hearing about a copper plan that's going to be offered. Are any of you familiar with that? Are you going to be offering copper plans? Mr. Coyne.

MR. COYNE: I am not familiar with that at this point.

REP. BURGESS: Mr. Wingle.

MR. WINGLE: Under the current rules for essential health benefits and the rules for qualified health plans we are not currently authorized to offer anything at the so-called copper level. Our plan benefits start at bronze unless somebody qualifies for catastrophic care and that's the lowest actuarial value we're allowed to offer presently.

REP. BURGESS: Mr. Evanko.

MR. EVANKO: In the event that copper plans were introduced as something that's allowed, we would certainly consider it. Cigna believes in choice as one of our core principles for our customers.

REP. BURGESS: Thank you. Mr. Rodgers.

MR. RODGERS: Currently, we're not approved to offer the copper plans. That's, certainly, something that -- you know, we believe that members need more cost-effective programs. So if those are offered I expect that we would --

REP. BURGESS: Mr. Matheis.

MR. MATHEIS: My comments would be similar to my colleagues', sir.

REP. BURGESS: Let me just ask each of you what is your payment rate for products in the large-group market? Starting with you, Mr. Coyne, what are your payments for products on the large-group market?

MR. COYNE: Individual (blue ?) plans have that information rather than the association.

REP. BURGESS: I see. Mr. Wingle.

MR. WINGLE: I carry no responsibility for large-group. I'd have to get back to you on that.

REP. BURGESS: Mr. Evanko.

MR. EVANKO: I'm not familiar with the large-group payment rates either. I'm sorry.

REP. BURGESS: Your company, though, is -- I mean, you're in the large-group market.

MR. EVANKO: We are, sir. Yes.

REP. BURGESS: Will you get that information for us? Thank you. Mr. Rodgers.

MR. RODGERS: I don't have that information with me.

REP. BURGESS: But you will provide it for the committee?

MR. RODGERS: Certainly.

REP. BURGESS: And Mr. Matheis.

MR. MATHEIS: I'm not sure I understand the question. Could you clarify it for me, please?

REP. BURGESS: Well, the question was what are your payment rates for products in the large group market.

MR. MATHEIS: So is that what our average premium is or --

REP. BURGESS: Your -- how many people pay.

MR. MATHEIS: I'm sorry, sir. I'm still not following the question.

REP. BURGESS: Well, what we have generally been talking about today is how many people --what percentage of people have paid. So can -- following along with that theme --

MR. MATHEIS: (Inaudible.) I'm sorry. I was a little slow on the uptake there. Typically, we would experience somewhere around a 98 to 97 percent premium payment in the group -- in the large-group market.

REP. BURGESS: Very well. Thank you all for your attendance today. I ask unanimous consent that members' written opening statements be introduced into the record. Without objection, the documents will be entered into the record. In conclusion, I'd like to thank all the witnesses and the members who participated in today's hearing. I'd like to thank everyone who stuck with us to the end. That would be the witnesses. I remind members they have 10 business days to submit questions for the record and I ask the witnesses to all agree to respond promptly to the questions. The committee now stands in adjournment.

DATELINE: SANTA FE

SANTA FE - A Tohatchi High School student 's tribute to his elders earned first place in the Congressional Art Competition for District 3, Rep. Ben Ray Luján announced in a news release Monday.

Davin Nez, of Tohatchi, won the competition with his black and white drawing "Tribute to the Elders: Navajo Woman." Luján honored Nez and five others for having the top pieces of artwork out of a field of 56 entries during a reception at the city of Santa Fe Arts Commission Community Gallery Saturday.

"Just as in year's past, the submissions for the 2014 Congressional Art Competition showcased the tremendous talent of New Mexico's young artists," Luján stated. "These students have shown great potential and are continuing a proud tradition of artistic excellence that is a hallmark of New Mexico."

Nez has earned a trip to Washington, where members of Congress will honor winners from across the country. The winning entries from each congressional district will be displayed as part of an exhibit in the U.S. Capitol for one year.

The other top pieces will be displayed in Luján's district offices across northern New Mexico.

Politics has been a going concern in Santa Fe since 1610, when the Spanish made it a provincial capital. Lujan grew up surrounded by that tradition and proved to be a student of it as well: He is good in a room and comes across as a friendly, confident and passionate liberal.

Lujan credits his personal style to his father, a former ironworker who served in the New Mexico House for almost four decades and was its speaker for the last 12 years of his life. (Ben Lujan died of lung cancer in 2012.) "I was able to learn from dad the importance of talking to people and treating everyone with respect," he said.

While tackling a policy agenda heavy in energy and technology, he does a lot of legwork for the Democratic Party. In his third term, he has political jobs with the potential to increase his national exposure. House Democratic leaders named him one of the party's 10 chief deputy whips. As both parties ponder the electoral implications of the growing Hispanic population, Lujan serves as the first vice chairman of the Congressional Hispanic Caucus.

And he's a co-chairman (along with Henry Cuellar of Texas) of the Latino Council for the Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee. "Sadly, in many parts of the country ... the only time [Latino voters] were reached out to or spoken to was two weeks before Election Day," Lujan said in 2014. His work for the DCCC involves networking with voters, potential candidates and donors -- he's an accomplished fundraiser.

Some people would claim that Lujan also climbed the ladder on the policy side of things by joining the Energy and Commerce Committee at the start of the 113th Congress (2013-14). The panel's broad jurisdiction allows him to continue work he started on the Natural Resources and Science, Space and Technology committees -- chiefly, dealing with New Mexico's national laboratories and energy sector.

The Energy Department operates the Los Alamos lab in Lujan's district and the Sandia lab in Albuquerque. Both facilities have dealt with budget crunches, and Lujan's strategy for stabilizing them is to "broaden the mission" and increase the number of stakeholders. Lujan often argues for legislative language compelling agencies -- such as the Department of Homeland Security -- to use the labs for their research and development needs whenever practicable. He wouldn't mind if the White House directed the labs to work on improvements to energy transmission and storage.

He also wants labs to work more closely with private industry in developing and testing technology to get it to the market. He formed the Technology Transfer Caucus in 2011 with Republican Frank R. Wolf of Virginia, and he now co-chairs it with Gus Bilirakis of Florida. According to Lujan, the Energy Department has been lax in using tech transfer programs that are already authorized. He'd like a renaissance for Cooperative Research and Development Agreements, which partner businesses with federal labs; though popular in the 1990s, CRDAs now require too much investment from the private sector, meaning only deep-pocketed companies can use them, he said.

Energy has been on Lujan's plate since his first elective office: As a member of the New Mexico Public Regulation Commission, he helped implement the state's standard for renewable energy production. He favors tax credits for such production and a national standard. He also says there's a long-term economic argument that isn't being made: "What happens if you have buildup of electricity generation in the country, and you get to a point where all those assets are depreciated and the cost of the fuel is free?"

Lujan ramped up his rhetoric on climate change starting in 2013, making more public statements on the issue as a member of the Safe Climate Caucus. Many New Mexicans "wouldn't consider themselves environmentalists or conservationists, but it's been a way of life" in the high desert, he said. Lujan joins those Democrats who try to link various natural disasters, such as forest fires that have damaged his district, to climate change.

On the Communications and Technology Subcommittee, Lujan voices his support for federal programs to expand broadband and cellular networks into the rural areas of his district. "From a safety perspective, there should be connectivity," he said, as first-responders try to locate anyone in distress. The Public Regulation Commission oversaw utilities, telecommunications, motor carriers and insurance companies, so Lujan has some experience in the consumer protection issues that come before the full committee.

Lujan grew up in the small farming community of Nambe, just north of Santa Fe. His great-grandparents, grandparents and parents all lived in his current home. Lujan's grandfather was a sheep herder, and the family still raises sheep on the land. He won a victory for the state's rural interests in 2014; a reauthorization of farm programs allows groups managing acequias -- small irrigation channels that sometimes predate the United States -- to apply for funds in the Agriculture Department's Environmental Quality Incentives Program.

Ben Lujan entered the state House in 1975, and his son remembers wandering the halls of the New Mexico Legislature and attending political events from an early age. After high school, he took classes at the University of New Mexico, though he did not receive a college degree until 2007, when he completed his course work at New Mexico Highlands University. In between, he worked a series of jobs, including stints as a dealer at a casino and in human resources at a horse racetrack.

He entered government in 2002 as deputy state treasurer. In the sometimes surly world of New Mexico politics, opponents accused Ben Lujan of nepotism when his son landed that job. Ben Ray was then accused of riding his father's coattails when he took a seat on the Public Regulation Commission in 2005. The family has shrugged off those criticisms, sometimes with a smile. Lujan's office features a photo of his father doing yard work with a chainsaw, while he stands to the side. After he had joked with his father that he might become the more famous Lujan, "this picture was kind of a reminder to say, 'Dad's still in charge.' "

Lujan entered the 2008 House race to succeed Democrat Tom Udall, who successfully ran for the Senate. He campaigned energetically while taking advantage of his family's fundraising connections. He beat five other primary candidates, taking more than 41 percent of the vote. The primary was the hard part. In November,Lujan took 57 percent in the heavily Democratic district. He hasn't been seriously challenged since then.

Dear Mr. President:

As we approach the 50th anniversary of the Medicare and Medicaid programs, along with the 50th anniversary of the Older Americans Act, we write to encourage you to host a White House Conference on Aging next year.

As you know, the White House Conference on Aging has been held with some regularity for more than 50 years. The last conference, held in 2005, brought together approximately 1200 delegates from across the nation to make recommendations to the President and the Congress on aging policy for the next decade. Those discussions spurred dialogue on the issue of long-term care and preceded congressional action on the Older Americans Act in 2006 and the Elder Justice Act of 2010.

The conference is particularly important in light of the changing demographics of our population. By 2030, there will be more than 72 million older Americans, making up 19% of the total population. This growth will have profound impacts on our health care system, federal health and retirement programs, and our nation's debt and deficit. In a time of financial uncertainty, it is particularly important that we leverage all available resources to ensure that this growing segment of our population is well cared for.

The 2015 White House Conference on Aging would provide a forum to discuss these issues and develop the immediate and long-term solutions needed to address the challenges of an aging population. It would allow policymakers and advocates from across the country to come together to develop a comprehensive approach that puts the needs of older Americans and their families first.

We thank you for your attention to this request, and we look forward to working with you to continue dialogue on these important issues.

Sincerely,

Michelle Lujan Grisham (NM-01)

DR. NORA D. VOLKOW, DIRECTOR, NATIONAL INSTITUTE ON DRUG ABUSE, NATIONAL INSTITUTES OF HEALTH

DR. H. WESTLEY CLARK, DIRECTOR, CENTER FOR SUBSTANCE ABUSE TREATMENT, SUBSTANCE ABUSE AND MENTAL HEALTH SERVICES ADMINISTRATION [*] BURGESS: Good morning. I now convene the hearing of the Subcommittee of Oversight Investigations entitled "Examining the Growing Problems of Prescriptions Drug and Heroine Abuse." Just a brief housekeeping detail for those of you who are expecting to see Dr. Murphy here in the Chair, he was called away back to his district for a family issue, so you're stuck me as the saying goes, but we will get through this together.

On the issue of prescription drug and heroine abuse, these separate and distinct problems, but unfortunately they do share a common endpoint addiction abuse, overdose and death.

As we know the abuse of prescription drugs and illegal drugs such heroine have plagued our nation for decades. However, over the last several months, there have been increasing reports that prescription drug and heroine abuse in communities around the country continues to grow. Sadly, those reports indicate that overdose deaths as a result of prescription drug and heroine are also on the rise. Families have lost sons and daughters, mothers and fathers to this addiction.

Data from the Federal agencies charged with addressing drug abuse paint a startling picture of the severity of the public health crisis. Prescription drug abuse kills more than 16,000 people a year. From 2007 to 2012, heroine use rose by almost 80 percent in this country and 3,000 people died each year from heroine overdoses.

The United States Attorney General Eric Holder declared recently that heroine abuse constitutes "An urgent and growing public health crisis". Certainly, there is a law enforcement aspect to solving this problem and stopping the bad actors who illegally distribute prescription drugs or traffic heroine. But the other part of the equation is treating the addiction, the addiction to prescription drug and heroine and preventing deaths. The answer to a burgeoning heroine epidemic, as the administration has called it, is not to wage war on all opioids. To address a complex to solution cannot be simple.

The purpose of today's hearing is to examine the federal response, including the public health response to prescription drug and heroine abuse. Our oversight has revealed that this is a complex problem. Those who abuse drugs also have often an underlying mental illness. Treating their addiction means that the underlying mental illness must be successfully diagnosed and treated.

As testimony of Mr. Botticelli states, the substance abuse is a "progressive disease." Those who suffer from addiction often started at young age with alcohol, maybe marijuana move on to other drugs like opioids. In examining opioid abuse, we must also consider the factors that lead people to abuse and what we are doing to address those factors.

Many Americans also suffer from chronic and debilitating pain. It's important to remember that the millions of individuals who safely use opioid narcotics under the guidance of their physicians, pain and we that a loved one would never have to suffer is involved. As Dr. Volkow of NIH recognizes in her testimony, we need to recognize the special character of prescription drug abuse. On the one hand, we have a growing prescription drug and opiate addiction. On the other, we have a very real need for these drugs to treat chronic pain, treat acute pain and alleviate suffering where it exists, especially in patients with chronic conditions who are suffering from illnesses like cancer. These drugs are safe when used as directed. It is their improper use that leads to abuse, overdose and death.

Over recent years, we've heard a great deal about doctor shopping, about pill mills, and about the efforts of the Prescription Drug Monitoring Plans to address these problems. We need to ensure that doctors and pharmacists have the tools at their disposal to adequately fill their role in ensuring appropriate prescribing. But addicts also get these drugs through illegal channels, such as rogue Internet pharmacies, off the street and obtaining them through family members who may have out dated prescription. Although some question whether federal efforts to crackdown and prevent prescription drug abuse have contributed to the recent rise in heroine abuse and whether this should have been anticipated, there's no question that both are on the rise. And as a consequence we have a responsibility to recognize and solve that problem.

While most prescription drug abusers do not go on to abuse heroine there is data from the Whitehouse Office of National Drug Control Policy and the Substance Abuse in Mental Health Services Administration that indicates over 80 percent of people who started using heroine in 2008 to 2010 had previously abused prescription drugs.

The federal government is devoting resources to drug control programs. Some would say significant--some would say significant resources over $25 billion annually, of which about $10 billion goes towards drug abuse, prevention and treatment programs across 19 different federal agencies. We will ask today's witnesses to identify the specific policies to programs, the initiatives that have the most effective in combating prescription drug and heroine abuse and which have not. With 19 agencies having a hand in over 70 drug controlled programs we need to know what is working and what is not. What can we do better? Is oversight by the federal agencies also an important issue as a significant funding a block granted to the states for their treatment programs.

Testifying before us today are representatives of five the agencies with lead roles in addressing opiate abuse. Mr. Michael Botticelli, the Acting Director of the White House Office national Drug Control Policy, Mr. Daniel Sosin of the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, Dr. Nora Volkow of the National Institute on Drug Abuse, Dr. Westley Clark of the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration and Mr. Joseph Rannazzisi of the Drug Enforcement Agency. This is a prestigious panel, and we are very grateful for you presence here today. We certainly look forward to your testimony. I would now like to recognize for five minutes for the purposes of opening statement the Ranking Member Ms. DeGette of Colorado. DEGETTE: Thank you so much Mr. Burgess and we're glad to have you presiding today.

Prescription drug and heroine abuse is a public health crisis, and its growing everyday. In many communities across the country, we're seeing an epidemic of opioid overdose deaths. I'm interested in learning from the panel about what more we can do to prevent the abuse of these drugs and also to save lives. The non-medical use of opiates has escalated in recent years. In 2011, hospitals tallied nearly half a million emergency room visits related to these medications, the number of these visits nearly tripled over a seven-year period. The link between prescription opioid use and heroine abuse is also deeply troubling. And as the chairman noted, only a small percentage of people who used pain relievers go on to abuse heroine but the opposite is not true. The vast majority of those who abuse heroine previous abused prescription drugs.

While far more people can continue to abuse prescription drugs, the number of individuals who reported using heroine nearly doubled between 2007 and 2012. There's also evidence to suggest the people who abuse prescription drugs move on to heroine as pain relievers become less available or too costly. At 2012 study in the New England Journal of Medicine found heroine use rose dramatically after the introduction of an abused deterrent form of Oxycotin. The use of drugs that ultimately lead to addiction and abuse often begins innocently.

The majority of people who illegally use a prescription drug get that drug from a friend or a family member often and sometimes the drug has been stolen. But in other times, a parent may even give the drug to a child unaware of the risks. We must educate patients on the dangers of abuse of these drugs as well as the need to properly store and dispose of them. If we could reduce inappropriate access to drugs, we can also reduce the incidence of their abuse. We must change the public perception of the prescription opioids. We face the inaccurate perception that just because the drug legal, it is somehow less harmless, less addictive and less risky.

Providers should also be better educated on the use and potential abuse of these drugs, so they can be more effective in recognizing problems of abuse and in turn more effective in educating and treating the patients. Study show that even brief interventions by health care providers can be successful in reducing or eliminating substance abuse by patients who began abusing prescription opioids but have not yet become addicted to them.

When prescribed appropriately, these medicines provide much needed relief and many patients have had their suffering reduced by opiate pain killers. However, a patient with an acute short-term pain may be able to find relief from a less addictive pain killer. Prescription drug abuse is a public health problem and it's not just law enforcement problem. Reducing this abuse will require a multi- faceted approach and partnership among federal state and local agencies. Every state should effectively use prescription drug monitoring programs. These databases help states identify and address drug diversion so they should be as robust and effective as possible. State should be able to share information with due regard for privacy expectations. Information should be added to the databases regularly including by encouraging prescribers and pharmacist to use the databases. When used, they can help doctors and public health authorities to prevent and respond to the potential devastating effects of prescription drug abuse.

I'm interested in learning from our witnesses today about the effects of this medication assisted treatment that we're hearing about, and also whether we have the resources to meet the demand for these treatment programs. I'm also interested in learning about the state of research into new medications with lower abuse potential and how we can expand access to over doors interventions like Nexium.

Prescription opioid and heroine abuse as you said Mr. Chairman is a serious public health treat. I look forward to hearing from all of the witnesses and to working with all of my colleagues on both sides of the aisle to ensure that Congress plays a vital role in protecting families from the growing danger of these drugs and yield back the bouncing my time.

BURGESS: The young lady yields back. The Chair now recognizes gentlelady from Tennessee. Five minutes for purposes of opening statement, please.

BLACKBURN: Thank you Mr. Chairman. And I know we are all cheering for Congressman Murphy and his daughter as they are about to welcome that new baby into their family. What an exciting, exciting time. I can only tell you the joys of being a grandparent are marvelous. It is a big part of my day.

Well, I thank you for the attention that we are putting on this issue. Prescription drug and heroine abuse are epidemic in our country. And I think you can tell by what is being said in this room this morning. It is an issue that our Committee is concerned about. And I applaud the efforts of the committee to take a very thoughtful approach in process as how we move forward. It is clear that we need to understand the factors that have contributed to the rise and prescription drug and heroin abuse.

We need to understand which prevention treatment and law enforcement efforts are the most effective in reducing the abuse of prescription drug and heroin. Another side of this issue are the millions of Americans who have legitimate need for prescription medication for the control of pain. Reduction of anxiety began the overall improvement of their lives. These medications must be available to them. HR 4069 the Ensuring Patient Access and Effective Drug Enforcement Act to the 2013 that is a bill by Representative Marino and I. It will establish a combating prescription drug abuse working group.

This group will include members from the DEA, FDA, ONDCP, state Attorney Generals, patient groups, pharmacies industry, healthcare providers and others. Within one year of enactment, the working group shall provide. They must do this provide recommendation is a congress on initiatives to reduce prescription drug diversion and abuse. We think this is the right approach. We welcome each about were witnesses we look forward to hearing your testimony and to the discussion. And with that, Mr. Chairman, I yield back my time or to anyone who is seeking time.

BURGESS: Seem no one seeking time. Gentlelady yields back. The Chair now recognizes the Ranking Member of the Full Committee, Mr. Maxman, five minutes for opening statement, please.

WAXMAN: Thank you Mr. Chairman for holding this important hearing today.

We're here to discuss the epidemic of opioid abuse. The numbers of stark each year approximately 17,000 people die from prescription opioid overdoses, and 3,000 died from heroin overdoses.

For far too long, prescription opioid pain relievers were prescribed too easily, without enough attention paid to the potential risks, and a large number people became addicted. Some of those who became addicted to prescription opioid eventually moved on to heroin, because that's a cheaper alternative offering the same high.

Fortunately, there are steps that we can take to fight this problem. I appreciate our witnesses being here today to discuss their efforts to educate the public and providers about the dangerous of abusing these drugs. We'll also hear how we can change prescribing practices monitor the use opioids, effectively treat those who are addicted, and investigate and prosecute those involve in diverting and trafficking these drugs.

Our five witnesses Mr. Rannazzisi from DEA, Mr. Botticelli from ONDCP, Mr. Sosin from CDC, Mr. Volkow from NIH, and Dr. Clark from SAMHSA represent an all-star panel of experts. We're delighted that you're here.

There are many reasons that be thankful for the launch of the Affordable Care act. Let me repeat that, there are many reasons to be thankful for the launch of the Affordable Care Act. One that is often overlooked is the help the law offers to individuals addicted to prescription opioids and heroin. The lack of insurance and the high cost of treatment can presented an insurmountable barrier to receiving the health they need.

The Affordable Care Act addresses this problem by expanding insurance coverage and requiring all policies to cover the concepts substance abuse services. This will mean that millions of individuals with addiction disorders will have access to the tools they need to have break their addictions.

We need to build upon this hopeful step and increase our efforts to comeback this epidemic.

And Mr. Chairman at this point, I wish to yield the balance of my time to Welch from Vermont.
WELCH: I thank the member from California for yielding. And I thank the Committee for having this hearing. But I want to give some credit to Governor Peter Shumlin of Vermont. He just something extremely unusual. He dedicated his entire stay to the state address to the single problem. And that was of all his decision for two reasons. One, most of the times the state to the state is a under lists objectives and hopes. This got very specific about one topic.

But second, in taking this on, he made public what people new was real but didn't want to acknowledge. And what we seen in Vermont as a result in that, was that we're facing what is the terrible problem but it creates enormous anxiety for the folks that are in the grip of this addiction. But their families -- and before we begin talking about this, it was restricted to our law enforcement folks and our mental health folks who are dealing with these isolated individuals, as though, they were the only ones in the world that face this incredible challenge.

And what Governor Shumlin did is he brought out in the open and that was enlarged part because he's travels around and governors do get around. Just talking to our law enforcement people like Chief Taylor in St. Albans, like Chief Baker in Rutland. And they were dealing on the street with kids that they knew and with adults that they knew who had jobs. But have this horrible addiction and they have to deal with it.

And what our police kept saying who have front line responsibilities, you can not arrest your way out of this. And there is a distinction that they make between the dealers who came from out of state and starts deflecting our kids and other with this opioid addiction, you know, throw to book at them and forget about them.

But a lot of the kids who are in the grip, they are kids. They got a future. They got a challenge. And what has happen in our communities with the leadership of our police and our mental health people, and our Mayor like Liz Gamache in Saint Albans and like Chris Louras in Rutland is that by bringing this out into the open, it helped us talk about this in concrete ways so that there's not only the treatment program the (inaudible) program which I hope you might talk about. But it also is allowing parents in the community to see this is something where we all have to be engage to provide some basis to support for these kids and adults who want not to be in the grip of this horrible opioid addiction. So, I thank you the committee for having this hearing and making it a collective effort to try to bring our resources together to help people get hold. Thank you.

BURGESS: The gentleman yields back. I would now like to introduce the witnesses on the panel for today's hearing. Mr. Michael Botticelli is the Acting Director of the Office Of National Drug Control Policy in the Executive Office of the President, Dr. Daniel Sosin, he is the Acting Director of the National Center for Injury Prevention and Control at the Center For Disease Prevention, Dr. Nora Volkow is the Director of the National Institute on Drug Abuse at the National Institute of Health, Dr, Wesley Clark is the Director of the Center for Substance Abuse Treatment within the Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration, and Mr. Joseph Rannazzisi is the Deputy Assistant Administrator in the Office Diversion Control within the Drug Enforcement Agency at the United States Department of Justice.

I will swear in the witnesses as you're aware to committee is holding -- this committee is holding an investigative hearing, and when doing so has have the practice of taking testimony under oath. Do you have any objections to testifying under oath this morning?

Seeing a negative response from the witnesses, the Chair then advises that under the rules to the House or the rules to the Committee, you are entitled to be advised by council. Do any of our witnesses desired to be advised by council during testimony today? And negative response was received from the panel witnesses. In that case, if you would please rise and raise your right hand I will swear you in.

Do you swear that the testimony you are about to give this the truth the whole truth and nothing by the truth.

Let it be noted that the witnesses answer affirmatively. You're now under oath. In subject to penalty set forward in Title 18, Section 1001 of the United States Code. We would now welcome a five-minute summary of your written statements. We will start with Mr. Botticelli and moved down the table.

BOTTICELLI: Chairman Burgess, Ranking Member DeGette, and members of the Subcommittee. I want to thank you for the opportunity to appear today to discuss the tremendous public health and safety issues surrounding the diversion and abuse of opioid drug, including many prescription pain killers and heroin in the United States.

I know that given reason media attention to overdose test. There was high in public interest in the threat of opioid drug use. But this is something many communities have been dealing with her very long time and it's a matter of great concern for this administration.

According to the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, drug overdose deaths primarily driven by prescription opioids, now surpass homicides and traffic crashes and the number of injury deaths in America.

In 2010 the latest here (ph) for which nationwide data are available. Approximately, 100 Americans died on average from overdose everyday. Prescription analgesics were involved, you know, most 17,000 of those deaths that year and heroin was involved in about 3,000.

In more recent data posted by several states indicates that death from heroin continue to increase. While heroin use remains relatively low in the United States as compared to other drugs, there has been a troubling increase in the number of people using heroin in recent years, from 373,000 past year users in 2007 to 669,000 in 2012.

It is clear that we cannot arrest our way out of the drug problem. Science has shown us that drug addiction is the disease of the brain, a disease that can be prevented, treated and from which one, can recover.

We know that substance use disorders include those driven by opioids are progressive disease. Many people who develop a substance use disorder begin using at a young age and often start with alcohol, tobacco, and or marijuana. We know that as an individual's abuse of prescription opioids becomes more frequent or chronic, that person is more inclined to purchase the drugs from dealers or obtain prescriptions from multiple doctors rather than simply getting it from a friend or relative for free or without asking.

This progression of an opioid use disorder may lead an individual to pursue a lower cost alternatives such as heroin. With these circumstances in mind, we release the Obama administration's inaugural National Drug Control Strategy in 2010 in which we set out a wide array of actions to expand public health interventions and criminal justice reforms to reduce drug use and its consequences in the United States. That strategy noted opioid overdose as a growing national crisis and set specificals for reducing drug use including heroin.

Three years ago, the Administration released the first comprehensive action plan to combat the prescription drug abuse epidemic. The Prescription Drug Abuse Prevention Plan strikes a balance between the need to prevent diversion and abuse and the need to ensure legitimate access to prescription pain medications.

The plan expands on the National Drug Control Strategy and brings together a variety of federal state, local and tribal partners to support one, the expansion of state based prescription drug monitoring programs, two, more convenient and environmentally responsible disposal methods for removing expired or unneeded medication from the home, three, education for patients and training of healthcare providers in the proper prescribing practices and treatment of substance use disorders, and four, reducing the prevalence of pill mills and doctor shopping through enforcement efforts.

This work has been paralleled by efforts to address heroin trafficking and use. The Administration is also focusing on several key areas to reduce and prevent opioid overdoses including educating the public about overdose risk and interventions, increasing access to naloxone and emergency overdose reversal medication. And working with states to promote Good Samaritan laws and other measures that can help save lives, because police are often the first on seen of an overdose, the Administration strongly encourages local law enforcement agencies to train and equip their personnel with this life-saving drug.

It is not enough, however, to save a life from an overdose. A smart public health approach requires us to catch the signs and symptoms of substances early before it develops into a chronic disorder. We have been encouraging the use of screening and brief intervention to catch risky substance use before it becomes an addiction.

And since only 11 percent of those who need substance use disorder treatment in 2012 actually received it, the Administration has dramatically expanding access to treatment. The Affordable Care Act and Federal parity law are extending access to substance use disorders and mental health benefits for an estimated 62 million Americans helping to close the treatment gap and integrate substance use treatment into mainstream healthcare. This represents the largest expansion of treatment access in the generation and can help guide millions into successful recovery.

The standard of care for treating substance use disorder is driven by heroin or prescription opioids involves the use of medication-assisted treatment, and approach to treating opioid addiction that utilizes behavioral therapy along with FDA approved medications either methadone, buprenorphine or nalterxone.

Medication-assisted treatment has already helped thousands of people in long-term recovery. And I applaud the recent comment carried by my HHS colleagues and the New England Journal of Medicine to expand the use of medications to treat opioid addiction and reduce overdose deaths.

There are sometimes that our national efforts are working. The number of Americans 12 and older initiating the nonmedical use of prescription opioids in the past year has decreased significantly since 2009. Additionally, according to the latest Monitoring the Future survey, the rate of past year use of OxyContin or Vicodin among high school seniors in 2013 is at its lowest since 2002.

And recent studies have shown that implementation of robust naloxone distribution programs and the expansion of medication- assisted treatment can reduce mortality and also be cost effective.

However, continuing challenges with prescription opioids and the reemergence of heroin use underscore the need for leadership at all levels of government. We will, therefore, continue to work with our federal state tribal and community partners to continue to reduce and prevent the health and safety consequences of prescription opioids and heroin.

Thank you for the opportunity to address the Committee today.

BURGESS: The gentleman yields back. The Chair recognizes Dr. Sosin for purposes of five-minute opening statement, please.

SOSIN: Good morning, Chairman Burgess and members of the Subcommittee. Thank you for the opportunity to testify about the public health issues related to prescription drug overdoses and the Centers for Disease Control and Preventions role in preventing them.

It is an honor to be with you today to talk about CDC's approach to prescription drug overdoses and the prevention of them.

Drug overdose death rates are higher than they have ever been. With prescription opioids being a key driver of this trend, more than 125,000 Americans have died from prescription opioid overdoses in the last decade. CDC has played an important role in raising the visibility of the health impact of prescription opioid overdoses in helping to identify the role of increased opioid prescribing and fueling this epidemic. Research also suggests that the growth in heroin use maybe due impart to the increase addiction cost by the rise in prescribing of opioid pain relievers.

The doubling in heroin use in the past six years is worrisome trend and undoubtedly has a relationship to prescription opioids, reducing inappropriate opioid prescribing as one of the approaches needed to keep people from becoming addicted to opioids and preventing them from later transitioning to heroin. Because of the complexity of these issues, the response demands engagement from a diverse group of federal state and local partners. The partners at this table are all critical in the overall goal to reduce abuse and overdose of opioids while ensuring that patients with pain are safely and effectively treated.

As the nation's health protection agency, CDC is focused on upstream drivers of this epidemic and this instance, the prescribing behaviors that created and continued to fuel this crisis. Our approach fits into three pillars that leverage CDC's unique expertise. One, improving data quality and use to monitor the trends and causes of the epidemic, timely drug specific information on prescribing and the health of facts of prescription drugs is critical. We generate, use and improve data to identify threats, assess local trends and evaluate the impact of prevention measures.

Two, strengthening state prevention efforts. States maintain Prescription Drug Monitoring Programs or PDMPs. They regulate healthcare professionals and institutions. They monitor the problem through their health departments and they run large public insurance programs including Medicaid. CDC provides resources and technical assistance to states to implement interventions and evaluate and adapt their approach to have the most impact.

And three, improving patient safety by supporting healthcare providers and systems with tools and data needed to respond effectively. For example, CDC is working to promote responsible opioid prescribing through guidelines and decision support tools. While CDC has ongoing work in each of these areas, we are focusing this year on accelerating state prevention efforts. We will be funding 45 state health departments for up to a total of $2 million per year to implement and evaluate the strategies I just outlined.

The 2015 President's Budget includes a request for $15.6 million in new funds to expand CDC's Core Violence and Injury Prevention Program, which is a state based program addressing injury and violence prevention. This will allow us to include additional states with a high burden of prescription drug overdose to prevent injuries and violence and expand the investments of these programs on reducing prescription drug overdose.

In conclusion, prescription drug abuse and overdose is a serious public health problem in United States. The burden of prescription drug abuse and overdose affects people of all walks of life and many sectors of our economy. Addressing this complex problem requires a multi-faceted approach and collaboration. CDC is committed to tracking and understanding the epidemic, supporting states working on the frontlines of this crisis, and rigorously evaluating what works to improve patient safety, prevent overdoses and save lives.

Thank you again for the opportunity to be here today.

BURGESS: Thank you, the gentleman yields back. The Chair recognizes Dr. Volkow for five minutes for an opening statement. Thank you.

VOLKOW: These are component of the NIH to speak about the value of science in helping address the problem from the diversion and abuse of prescription opioid pain killers and the related rising abuse of heroin.

Opioid medications are the most effective intervention we currently have for management severe pain. Unfortunately, these drugs, not only inhibit pain centers in the brain, but they are also potently activate brain reward regions which is why they are abuse and they can cause addiction.

So we face the unique challenge of preventing their abuse while safeguarding their value for managing severe pain which, if untreated, is terribly debilitating.

It is estimated that 2.1 million Americans are addicted to opioid pain killers which reflects in part the wide spread availability of these drugs.

Indeed, the number of yearly prescriptions for opioids has more than double over the past 20 years from 76 million to 207 million prescriptions per year. During that period, that in parallel, so a fourfold increase in overdoses -- death overdoses from prescription opioids.

Pain killers like OxyContin and Vicodin affect the brain similarly to heroin. They interact with exactly the same opioid receptors. Their difference depends on their potency, that is how strongly they activate those receptors and how rapidly they do so. So as for heroin, they can produce euphoria which some abusers of prescription medications intensify by taking higher doses, crushing the pills so that they can snort them or inject them, or taking them in combination with other drugs like alcohol and benzodiazepines.

These practices make opioids far more dangerous, not only because they are more addictive, but also because they increase the risk for respiratory depression which is the main cause of death from overdoses.

Recent trends, as the other witnesses have mentioned, also indicate the rising heroin abuse which currently affects more than half million Americans and this rise is possibly driven in part by people switching from prescription opioids to heroin because it is cheaper and some instances more available. Heroin is dangerous, not just because of its high addictiveness and overdose risk that it posses, but also because it is frequently injected which increases the risk of diseased like HIV and hepatitis C predominantly from the use of contaminated injection material.

So what is NIDA doing about the problem? We're funding research in three major areas. One, research that will allow us to manage pain more effectively, research that will allow us to in -- prevent deaths from overdoses, from opioids, and our research will allow us to treat substance use disorders more effectively including prescription medications.

As it relates to the safe management of pain, we still don't know enough about the risk for addiction among chronic pain patients or about how pain mechanisms in the brain interrupt with prescriptions opioid to influence their addictive potential, but ongoing research will help us clarify some of these issues.

So with respect to treatment, we're funding research to develop non-opioid based analgesics that are nonaddictive. Opioid medications that have less risk for diversion and abuse as -- given by different formulations or different ways of administering them. And finally, non-medication strategies for such as transcranial magnetic stimulation or electrical brain stimulation for the management of pain.

Research related to preventing overdoses making the effective opioid overdose antidote naloxone, which is very safe, more available, will help prevent many deaths. The FDA recently approved the hand- held auto-injector of naloxone that patients and others can use easily.

NIDA is supporting the development of user-friendly naloxones in the form of nasal spray to be used by non-medical personnel or the overdose victim.

Also, since many overdoses of when no one is around or during sleep, NIDA is supporting the development of self-activated systems that initiate an emergency response when wireless ends or signal than of an overdose is abhorring (ph).

As it relates to opioid addiction, methadone, buprenorphine or nalterxone have been shown to be effective in treating opioid addiction and in preventing overdoses. But these medications are not dangerous widely. NIDA is working to overcome the barriers that interfere with their adoption.

In parallel, research of new interventions such as vaccines for heroin will allow us to treat this problem in a different way and to prevent it.

Additionally, we work with our partner, CDC, SAMHSA, ONDCP and ONC in implementing and evaluating evidence based interventions.

Again, I want to thank you for recognizing the urgency of the problem post by the abuse of prescription opioids and for inviting NIDA to this (inaudible) science and help address this problem.

BURGESS: The Chair thanks the doctor, gentlelady yields back. The Chair recognizes Dr. Clark five minutes for the purposes of summarizing your opening statement, please.

Your microphone, sir.

CLARK: Thank you for inviting Substance Abuse and Mental Health Services Administration to participate in this panel. I echoed (ph) the testimony of my colleagues regarding the importance of the topics of this hearing. I'll focus on census, programs and activities, but I want to point out that we've worked with our federal partners with states, tribes and local communities.

According to the National Survey on Drug Use and Health which SAMHSA conducts 4.9 million people reported non-medical use of pain relievers during the past month in 2012. 335,000 reported past month use of heroin, it figured that has more than doubled in six years.

In 2012, more than 1.89 million people reported initiating non- medical use of pain relievers. And 156,000 reported initiating the use of heroin. One challenge in combating the misuse of pain relievers is educating the public on dangerous of sharing medications.

According to our national survey, 54 percent of those who obtained pain relievers or non-medical use in the past year received them from a friend or relative for free. Another 14.9 percent either bought them or took them from a friend or relative. Thus, we have both a public health problem intertwined with the cultural problem. SAMHSA has several programs focused on educating the public including the not worth the risk even if it's legal campaign which encourages parents to talk to their teens about preventing prescription drug abuse.

Our prevention of prescription abuse in the workplace effort supports programs who are employers, employees and their families. Our partnership for success grant includes prescription drug abuse prevention as one of the capacity building activities in communities of high need. Our Screening, Brief Intervention and Referral to Treatment program include screening for illicit drugs including heroin and other opioids. We've developed programs to help physicians maintain a balance between providing appropriate pain management and minimizing the risk of pain medication misuse.

Our SBIRT Medical Residency program includes the modules of prescription opioids for pain management and opioid misuse. Over 6,000 medical residents and over 13,700 non-residents have been trained nationally. Our Physician Clinical Support System for Medication Assisted Treatment training is available via live in- person, live online and recorded modules accessible at anytime.

SAMHSA funds the Prescriber's Clinical Support System for opioids therapist in collaborative project led by the American Academy of Addictions Psychiatry with six other leading medical societies. We will be funding a Provider's Clinical Support System on the appropriate use of opioids in the treatment of pain in opioid related addiction this fiscal year.

Last week's article in the New England Journal of Medicine authored by HHS leadership, including Dr. Volkow and SAMHSA's administrator, describes the underutilization of vital medications and addiction treatment services, and discusses ongoing efforts by major public health agencies to encourage their use.

Medication-assisted treatment includes three strategies. Agonist therapy which includes methadone maintenance. Partial agonist therapy which includes buprenorphine. And antagonist therapy which uses an extended release injectable nalterxone or vivitrol.

SAMHSA is responsible for overseeing the regulatory compliance of certified Opioid Treatment Programs which use methadone and or buprenorphine for treatment of opioid addiction.

We estimate that there are approximately 300,000 people receiving methadone maintenance. There are currently 26,000 physicians with a waiver prescribe buprenorphine of this 7,700 unauthorized to prescribe up to a hundred patients.

We estimate that there are 1.2 million people receiving buprenorphine. SAMHSA also issued an advisory encouraging drug cohorts to utilize vivitrol in their treatment programs.

In August of 2013, we published the Opioid Overdose Toolkit to educate families and first respondents, individuals, prescribing providers and community members about steps to take, to prevent and treat opioid overdose including the use of naloxone. When administered quickly and effectively, naloxone restores breathing to a victim in the throes of an opioid overdose. This can be use as a teachable moment to asses treatment need and refer the person to the appropriate resources.

We inform states and jurisdictions that the Substance Abuse Prevention and Treatment Block Grant primary prevention set-aside funds maybe utilized to support overdose prevention education and training.

In addition, we notified jurisdiction, the block grants other than the primary prevention set-aside funds maybe used to purchase naloxone. And then necessary materials to assemble overdose kits to cover the cost associated with the dissemination of such kits.

SAMHSA continues to focus on our mission of reducing the impact of substance abuse and mental illness on America's communities. We thank the Subcommittee Chairman and members for conveying this important hearing, and providing SAMHSA with the opportunity to address these very critical issues.

BURGESS: The gentleman yields back. The Chair now recognizes Mr. Rannazzisi five minutes for purposes of summarizing your test testimony, please sir.

RANNAZZISI: Thank you Chairman Burgess, distinguished Members of the Subcommittee, on behalf of DE Administrator Michelle Leonhart, the men and women of the Drug Enforcement Administration, I want to thank you for the opportunity to discuss today the relationship between prescription opioids and heroin and how DEA is addressing the public health problem.

First, let me say that the President State of Affairs is not a surprise. DEA has been concerned about the connection between the rising prescription, opioid diversion and abuse problem in rising heroin trafficking use for several years. The DEA believes that increased heroin use is driven by many factors including the increase in the misuse and abuse of prescription opioids. The science had been there for sometime now.

Law enforcement agencies across the country have been reporting an increase in heroin use by teens and young adults who began their cycle of abuse with prescription opioids. Treatment providers report that opioid addicted individuals switched between prescription opioids and heroin depending on price and availability. Non-medical prescription opioid is used particularly by teens and young adults who can easily lead to heroin use, heroin traffickers know all this. And a relocating to areas with prescription drug abuse is on the rise.

To give you an example, we know that many teens and young adults first get their prescription opioids for free from medicine cabinets or friends. But assume that a teenager gets hydrocodone schedule III prescription opioid. And also most -- the most prescribed drug in the United States from a family medicine cabinet or a friend. Once that free source runs out, it could cost just a little between $5 and $7 a tablet on the street. But then the teen will eventually need more opioid to get the same effect that he's trying to achieve.

Black market sales for prescription drugs are typically five to ten times the retail value. On the street, a schedule II prescription opioid can cost anywhere from $40 to $80 per tablet depending on the relative strike of the drug. These increasing costs make it difficult to continue purchasing especially for teens and young adults who don't have steady sources of income.

Given the high cost to maintain this high, the teenager turns to heroin at a street cost of generally $10 a bag. The teenager gets a high similar the one he got when he abused prescription drugs. It's just that easy. Any long-term solution or reduced opioid abuse must include actions to address prescription drug diversion and misuse, while also educating the public about the dangerous of non-medical use of pharmaceuticals educating prescribers and pharmacists in treating those individuals who have moved from misuse and abuse to addiction.

The DEA currently operates 66 Tactical Diversion Squads in 41 states, the Districts of Columbia and the Caribbean. These groups capitalized or combined law enforcement authorities of task force officers and DEA agents to conduct criminal investigations in the diversion of pharmaceutical drugs. The DEA regulates more than 1.5 million registrants. DEA diversion groups concentrate on the regulatory aspects of enforcing the Controlled Substances Act, utilizing the increase compliance inspections.

This oversight enables DEA to proactively educate registrants and ensure that DEA registrants understand and comply with the law. The Tactical Diversion Squads and the diversion groups have brought their skills to barren (ph) what was previously known as ground zero for prescription drug use, Florida based internet pharmacies and pain clinics.

As the current pill mill threat is driven out of Florida and moves North and Northwest, DEA will continue to target the threat with the tactical diversion groups proven law enforcement skills, the diversion groups regulatory expertise and by educating registrants.

DEA and our law enforcement partners have aggressively targeted both prescription drug diversion and heroin trafficking. From 2001 to 2012, there's been a staggering increase in drug analysis of opioid pain medications, 275 percent for oxycodone, 197 percent for hydrocodone, and 334 percent for morphine.

This has also been a significant increase in heroin cases. From 2008 to 2012, there's a 35 percent increase. If the data for the first half of 2013 remains constant, the increase from 2008 to 2013 would be approximately 51 percent.

The increase in heroin abuse and trafficking is a symptom of our countries appetite for prescription opioids, that'll eventually lead to abuse and addiction. It's a natural progression from the abuse of prescription opioids. There's a dangerous misperception that abusing prescription drugs is safer than abusing heroin. Both abuse of prescription opioids and heroin can lead to addiction and death.

Preventing the availability of pharmaceutical controlled substances to non-medical users and educating practitioners, pharmacist, and public about pharmaceutical diversion, trafficking and abuse of priorities at DEA. As such, DEA will continue to work as a -- with a cooperative effort with other federal state and local officials, law enforcement, professional organizations and community groups to address this epidemic.

Thank you for your invitation to appear today. And I look forward to answering any questions that you may have. Thank you.

BURGESS: The gentleman yields back, and thanks the gentlemen for his testimony.

Now, hear from the -- from the members for questions. Five minutes for each member. I'll begin -- well, Mr. Rannazzisi, you just gave some rather startling statistics, (inaudible) Mr. Botticelli. You said at your testimony, we can't rest our way out of this problem. So let me just ask you from a federal perspective, we put a lot of money, a lot of effort on behalf of taxpayers into this, what is it that is -- what is it about this that is not working?

Mr. Botticelli, we'll start with you. And maybe we can just go down the line and just answer the question. How has this become the problem that it is?

BOTTICELLI: You know, I think in number of my federal panelist have articulated some of the problems and I think, you know, first and foremost, a lot of this issue is driven by the vast overprescribing of prescription pain medication. You know, a recent report by the GAO showed that the vast majority of physicians get little to no training in substance use disorders and little to no training in safe opioid prescribing. And a part of our ...

BURGESS: Let me stop you there, because this is not a new problem. I mean, this was a problem 40 years ago when I was in medical school. And I would disagree with the statement that we got no training, but OK the training may not be adequate to the scope of the problem. But honestly, can we say that this is something that just happened to us as if we were completely unaware that this was an issue? I mean, how can you possibly make a statement like that?

BOTTICELLI: I think, you know, part of what the balance has been and I think it's been out of kilter is, you know, that physicians quite honestly were pushed in terms of making sure that we adequately treated pain in the United States. And we absolutely need to make sure that we do that. I think we need to have a balance strategy that understand the tremendous addiction potential of these drugs.

The risky patients that we have before is in terms of who should be prescribed with prescription medication, as well as monitoring those who are developing our problem. So I do think that this is a balance approach in terms of both making sure that we are adequately treating pain. But we're also not inadvertently creating a problem by overprescribing these medications to people who are developing our problem or who are at risk.

BURGESS: Well, I don't want to words as rough (ph), Mr. Rannazzisi seemed to imply that we are overprescribing, is that a fair assessment of your testimony?

RANNAZZISI: I think that if you're talking about 99.5 percent of the prescribers, no, they're not overprescribing. But, we're dealing -- our focus is in both pain clinics and road doctors, who are overprescribing. Actually, they're prescribing illegally, they're not overprescribing, they're illegally prescribing. So, yes, concerning that overprescribing, yes.

BURGESS: Well, that's your job, your law enforcement so you need to close them down, right?

RANNAZZISI: And we're trying, they're overwhelming us with numbers.

BURGESS: All right, I do want everyone response of that because the interest of time and wanted to keep to the five minute. Therefore, I'm going to submit that in writing to each of you.

I want to bring up something for each -- several of you have brought it up and that's the issue of making naloxone much more available, maybe we should also be talking about making imovax (ph) available for people who are going to overdose. I mean, it's hard to know who's going to overdose.

But -- Mr. Botticelli, you brought it up, I think Mr. Sosin, you brought it up as well. But, what is the issue here with making this available? BOTTICELLI: You know, I think that we've tremendously hard in both at the federal level as Dr. Volkow talked about in terms of the approval of new delivery devices for doing that. One of the main areas that ONDCP has been working with our state partners is the passage of state legislation to look at naloxone distribution. And so, I think we have now 17 states had been acted, naloxone distribution legislation which I think has really been helpful here. We've also been in quite honestly working with many law enforcement agencies across the state.

BURGESS: Pardon me for a moment, but it is a federally controlled substance, is it not? Naloxone?

BOTTICELLI: It's not a controlled substance, if I remember it correctly ...

BURGESS: OK, is there a cost issue?

BOTTICELLI: There is a cost issue. And one of things, Chairman, that you asked is what are the opportunities that we have in terms of looking at this. And again, I think, you know, the -- and, you know, again, we're really helpful that SAMHSA looked at existing -- how we might use existing federal funds.

But I think if there's an area that we can continue to explore together is how we might enhance resources for many overdose prevention efforts. One of the things that I've heard as I've traveled around the country is that having state legislation and having these devices is a great start. But that many states and local areas are under resource in terms of implementing ...

BURGESS: Yeah. And again, I may submit that in -- for answer in writing as well. Ms. Volkow, let me just ask you, you mentioned in your testimony to address this problem. We have to recognize special character of this phenomenon and part of which is the -- that opioids play a key role in relieving suffering. So, as providers and policy makers, are we doing a good job of walking this line?

VOLKOW: I -- based on the numbers, I don't think we can say we are. And the reality that in this country, we have both under treatment of pain and overprescription of medications, these are not exclusive.

And one of the issues that we have in face and Mr. Botticelli has been discussing it. In 2000, when I joined the Committee for accreditation of hospital demanded that you'll treat pain if you see a steep increase in the number of prescriptions. So what you are doing in parallel, there has not been an increase in education in medical schools.

So, it's seven hours outreaching the United States, there's a diversity of opioid medications that are currently available. And there are many indications where actually patients are being given the opioids when it's not severe or pain. And this, for example, this is the case in many case for drunk people with dentist that are prescribing the opioid mediation. So there is a room for improvement on the education of providers.

The other issue too that we have not understood very much when we were -- I mean, certainly, when I was in medical school, they'll tell you if you prescribe an opioid medication with someone that is suffering from pain, they are not going to become addicted. Now, we can come to recognize that it's not the case that there are patients that are taking the medication as prescribed and they can become addicted. So the issue is who are they, how do we recognize them so we can prevent that transition. And ...

BURGESS: Yeah, and my time has expired. I would just offer the observation 40 years ago, I was given the admonition by a professor in anesthesiology, "This stuff is so good, don't even try at once." So, clearly it was known 40 years ago.

Recognize Mr. Welch five minutes for questions, please.

WELCH: OK, I want to thank the panel and the Chairman as well, you know, and for mine, as I mentioned in my opening statement, we're just trying to face this directly which is, I think, a much better approach than denial. And it's engaged the community in some very effective ways and it's developed, I think -- it's helped our providers develop what they call, I haven't spoke (ph) system, where there's an emphasis on medication which really does seem to be helping some folks who are willing to help.

And then some wrap around treatment services for people who can benefit by that. And a lot of our ability to do that is because we're getting some federal health. We get about $6 million out of the Substance Abuse Prevention and Treatment Block Grant, that's been level funded.

And my question, really, to Mr. Clark, can you explain the decision -- I guess, this is administration decision not to propose an increase in that program given the intensity of the crisis. And I think with this discussion occurring all around the country, obviously, you're going to have many more states that are willing to roll up their sleeves and try to get engaged which would suggest the resource need is there in order to help make thid successful. Dr. Clark?

CLARK: Mr. Welch, we are working very closely with state authorities with organizations like NASDAD and NASBED (ph) to address these issues. But we also, as Mr. Botticelli pointed out, approaching this from a comprehensive approach rather than simply using a single funding mechanism to address the issue. We need to keep in mind that we need multiple strategies to address this problem.

And with those multiple strategies, we believe that we can make an impact. So, relying indeed on the Affordable Care Act and other strategies we can leverage the block grant funding to target this.

We're also allowing jurisdictions to prioritize using our prevention efforts as well as our treatment efforts the problems that they experience in their respective jurisdiction ...

WELCH: All right, thank you, but no more money. Money is tight, I get it.

And Botticelli, your predecessor came up and had a great visit with us in Vermont, it's tremendous to have him there. And we've expanded the use of naloxone, and how do you say that?

BOTTICELLI: Naloxone.

WELCH: Naloxone, yeah. And we've have some success with that, we've had a number of instances of it being, you know, successfully just recently about 15 times. But do you think that the FDA should consider making that an over-the-counter medication?

BOTTICELLI: So, first of all, like, I really want to applaud you and Governor Shumlin in terms of calling significant attention to this issue. I spent a better part of career at Massachusetts and very familiar with heroin issue that we've had in New England for a long, long time.

You know, our office as part of our prescription drug abuse plan and overdose had looking for a continued ways to expand the use of naloxone. Again, I think, you know, we are hardened by this delivery device.

Our partners at NIDA are looking at and researching the expansion of -- and use of other way. So we're having conversations with both federal partners and quite honestly, some external stakeholders who are really, really, really interested in terms of looking at how do we increase the -- not only the availability of naloxone, but continue to promote easier to use and quite honestly, if we have some cheaper versions of naloxone.

WELCH: I got one time for one more question. Dr. Volkow, I want to ask you about this issue with doctors and with patients, you know, I've known close friends who've had serious medical issues and have been in a lot of pain. And once that line is crossed where they're getting the prescription medication, it almost it seems like there's an undertow where the answer to the paying question always is essentially to get more medication and more powerful medication.

And a patient in that moment is pretty vulnerable. And how does the -- and the doctor gets really persistent advocacy by the patient and sometimes the patients family. You've got to do something.

So, how do we help the doctors deal with what, you know, Dr. (inaudible), of course, yeah, another doctor here, how do they -- you know, there's a lot of doctors around here. So how the doctors really have to be in the frontline and it's very tough, because they've got a patient who's in pain, they've got a family who's saying we do something. But there's something that is getting done in many cases is resulting in long-term problems.

VOLKOW: Yeah, and they're torching on one of the hardest -- the issues to deal with clinically, how do you manage severe chronic pain. What many people don't know is that the risk of suicide for patients with chronic pain is double that of the general population. So it takes extraordinary rehabilitating. And the strongest medication we have are opioids, the problem with opioids apart from addictiveness is that you become tolerant very rapidly. And so that requires that you increase the dose. So chronically and then you have to shift to something more potent. And that's exactly where the whole problem lies around, they are not ideal. But it's what we have and it can relieve the patients in a moment that they need them.

The strategies, what other alternatives we can use just -- other than just relying us in opioids as the only alternative. And that's where researches ongoing to see -- that's what I was mentioning in the whole area of (plain) neuroscience. The feasibility of devices that can actually be used potentially to handle unmanaged pain will be a break through, you will rely less on medications.

And I also think that aspect of we, as a society, have created the expectation that anything that's wrong with you should be treated with a medication. So, zero tolerance for pain and I think that as a culture, we need to revision that also.

WELCH: Thank you, I yield back. Thank you very much.

BURGESS: Thank you. Thank you, Mr. Welch. And I'm sitting in an obvious little board, Dr. Burgess. Let me just make up a brief statement and then I'll ask my question. You know, as physician of many years, I don't think that even back in the day, we were given the proper training in regard to pain medication.

You know, also, I'll say this, there's been a lot of emphasis over the past 10 years or so, about advance directives and the necessity (inaudible) across the hospice programs that have developed in that sort of thing. But I don't hear hardly any discussion about patients given their wishes in regard to how they want their pain control in a thermal situation, where there's no chance for recovery. I don't know that people really understand in many instances pain medication has started because the family members don't want their loved one to suffer. That's quite natural and appropriate.

But before you know what the patient has gone beyond the stage where they can say, "Oh, look, I don't want to be totally zoomed (ph) out at the time of my demas (ph)."

So that's just, I guess, food for thought in a way.

I'm going to ask my specific question, Mr. Rannazzisi. You said earlier in your testimony that you're just get -- the DEA just get overwhelmed about all this road pain clinics that are popping out everywhere. How was that happening? How do these places just pop up, as you put it, and why is it happening, why are you getting overwhelmed?

RANNAZZISI: Well, that's a great question, sir. It's not just DEA that's overwhelmed. Our state and local counterparts are overwhelmed. Think about this, prior to Ryan Haight Act, the internet drug bill that was passed. There was, we'll say, seven clinics, pain clinics in Broward County. In 2010, there was 142 clinics in Broward County. Now, if you look, when we moved our enforcement groups down there and we move 10 tactical diversion squats to work with our state and local counterparts and we started knocking of these road pain clinics.

They moved up in New Georgia, if you look at the 75 corner (ph), there was over a hundred pain clinics going at 75 corner (ph). Some of them are right off the inner state and we just get off and get back on. Then they moved in the Tennessee, Tennessee now has approximately 300 clinics.

Now, if you think that the state and local law enforcement and DEA doesn't have the capacity to go after everyone of these clinics quickly because these are illegal drugs that they're peddling, and we have to establish that that doctor is prescribing outside the usual course professional practice and not for legitimate medical purpose that takes time.

These cases take time. So what they're doing is they're just counting on the fact that they're going to run the clinic that's not being hit by DEA. So, we're all overwhelmed, everyone in law enforcements.

BURGESS: And what percentage would use lie (ph) of these clinics are fraudulent?

RANNAZZISI: In Florida, the vast majority of them. In Georgia, I believe that the vast majority of those clinics had popped out were (ph), they were good pain clinics. No, don't get me wrong, every pain clinic is not bad.

BURGESS: Yeah.

RANNAZZISI: But the pain clinics that we're looking at are absolutely atrocious, there is no medical care.

BURGESS: Yeah.

RANNAZZISI: It's modern day crack outs.

BURGESS: Let me -- and thank you for that answer. And any of you could answer this. About last year, GAO, the Government Accountability Office found an overlap in 59 of the 76 programs it identified in the drug abuse and prevention area. What steps or any of your agencies taken to minimize overlap and more efficiently spend our taxpayer dollars? I mean, you would think that we could get some efficiency here. Anybody?

(UNKNOWN): Sure Chairman. You know our office has looked at that report and has been working with our federal partners to look at the breath (ph) of our prevention programs and to make sure that we are not quite honestly duplicating programs. You know, I do think that however, if you talk to many, many people at the local level, they will tell you however that we don't have enough prevention. And I think you heard from many, many folks up here that while we may have programs that are addressing the same issue, they're reaching not the entirety of the population. So we really want to make sure that one, that we are not kind of duplicating the programs that we have already.

BURGESS: Well, very important. I would think that you guys are talking to each other, of course. Others, I've got a little time left, two seconds, one second. Well, wait a minute. I'm the Chair now, aren't I? I've got five minutes left. Mr. Clark.

CLARK: Well ...

BURGESS: Dr. Clark, excuse me.

CLARK: One of the things we are concerned about in the administration is the issue of fragmentation overlap and duplication. And then we do -- we're very closely with our federal partners to make sure that we minimize fragmentation overlap and duplication and working under the persistence of ONDCP, we are able to address that. As was pointed out, communities need multiple resources and you find it -- sometimes, you cannot completely eliminate some overlap because indeed the unique issues of individual communities require that there'd be some overlap. But we are very sensitive to both the PDAO (ph) concerns and OMB's concerns about fragmentation overlap and duplication and insidiously try to avoid that.

BURGESS: Thank you all. I thank the panel. My time has expired. And your five minutes now to Mr. Lujan.

LUJAN: Mr. Chairman, doctor thank you so very much for the time today. And I'm glad to see that we're having this hearing. This is important. By the Chairman and the Committee staff acknowledging that this hearing needed to take place, we're acknowledging there's a problem across the country. The question after this hearing today though is, are we going to sweep this under the rug again or are we going to do something significant with recommendations that are going to come from experts? This is a problem plaguing America. The case in New York brought more attention to what was happening with heroin abuse and overdoses. But we've been losing lives across the country for years. And what are we going to do?

There's recommendations that have been put on the table by many experts that's been studied over and over and over. There's a program from 2011 to -- on the prescription drug side to reduce abuse significantly over five years. I'll be asking the question where are we with that. But every life that's lost as a result of this is one life too many. There's only so many parts of the world that are growing poppies. Do we not know as United States of America where poppies are being grown and where there -- how they're migrating into the United States in the form of heroin and illegal substances? It seems to me we should. And what are doing to stop that flow? That's very troubling.

Now going back to the prescription drug side, there's been presentations that we've seen in New Mexico that have been together by some people that I respect very much that show a correlation with drug overdoses with increased prescriptions that are coming up, not just pain medication facilities that are popping up. And so, one of the questions that I have is, is there data that's reported to any of you that you do analysis on where there is a core -- where there -- at least with the data that I've seen, there's -- showing that there's a correlation between overdoses and increased prescriptions that are being administered. And what do we do with that data? Are we able to go in or is that an area where we don't have enough support now between the federal and the state partners. And I'd asked anyone that like to tackle that.

(UNKNOWN): Thank you Congressman Lujan. You mentioned the New Mexico report. Dr. Pelosi (ph) from CDC worked with scientist in New Mexico, health department staff there, to analyze and demonstrate those relationships. And absolutely, there's a very tight relationship between the volume of opioid prescribing and opioid overdose deaths. That information does get used at a national level. I'm thinking about the areas to intervene. But also, at the state and local level, where it has to be to better understand how the problems in each individual jurisdiction and the factors that are influencing the prescribing practices are being addressed there.

One of the ways that CDC in particular works is by trying to liberate data by working with state and local health departments to understand the context of prescribing of health system data and of mortality data to put a better picture and understand the context within which overdose deaths are occurring and abuses occurring, and then be able to target programs like through their PDMP's, like restriction programs, et cetera that address those problems.

VOLKOW: If I may, but first of all, I want to thank you for bringing up the issue because the void (ph) that I view that this is an urgent issue and we cannot put it under the rule (ph) under no conditions. And I feel passionate because I do get the parents coming to me says "When we went to wake up our child, it was dead." And they wouldn't even know that they were abusing opioids. The other issue is that we do have the tools to actually address the problem of opioid prescription abuse and opioid deaths. We need to implement them.

We have treatments that work for drug addiction that can decrease the number of overdoses. But also, we need to address the problem that we have with chronic pain in this country. How many people suffer chronic pain in this country? Estimated IOM, a hundred million, a hundred million. There is a notion on that one hand that there is an increase in chronic pain and that needs to be addressed. So, from the healthcare perspective we need to address it.

LUJAN: And Dr. Volkow, as my time expires, there is some questions that I'll be submitting into the record, but I would welcome your response as well. And Mr. Chairman I just wanted to share with you that there is a program in New Mexico that appears to be working with the distribution of Narcan where there's been a reversal of more than 250 overdoses last year where they're getting it to the hands of first responders and nurses. So it's not necessarily on the street, but it's with those that are responding to these accidents. And there maybe a way for us to work on that with some ideas down the road.

Mr. Chairman, again, I share before you a return to that hearing how much we appreciate that you're doing this and you brought this hearing. But I certainly hope that there's more that will be done and this hearing won't be the last of hearings and conversations and an approach that we can take as a Congress to work with our state partners to do something. This is a bad problem across the country but it's also plaguing New Mexico. Thank you for your attention to this Mr. Chairman.

BURGESS: The Chair thanks the gentleman and does also observe that further hearings are likely to be necessary and as Mr. Welch put it up to hear from governors. And I'd like to hear from some of our mayors because they are on the -- they are on the first lines of this battle. The Chair now recognizes the gentlelady from North Carolina. Ms. Ellmers, five minutes for questions please.

ELLMERS: Thank you Mr. Chairman. And thank you to our panel for being here today addressing this very important issue. I'd like to start by asking a question of Mr. Botticelli and Dr. Volkow. Understanding the path of addiction, there is, and I think you have both identified a genetic basis for that. One of the things I would like to know is again the progression. Is there something that starts with tobacco use, smoking, use of alcohol drinking? And then how does it progress and how do you feel not (ph). I'll just start with Mr. Botticelli and then have Dr. Volkow comment.

BOTTICELLI: Just about everything that this field knows about this has come from the work of Dr. Volkow. You know, clearly, we know that there's a genetic predisposition for many people in terms of family history of substance abuse. But we also know that there's like many diseases. There are environmental factors that go into that issue. You know, we know that substance use disorder is a disease that have early onset, so that many people who do develop, left untreated, left undiagnosed developed a substance use disorder largely because of starting alcohol, tobacco and or marijuana use at a very young age.

Clearly, there are some particular issues as it relates to the addiction potential of prescription drug medication. But the vast majority of people that at least I have talked to in the data show that those folks who do have a significant opioid use disorder have started from a very young age and, you know, if you saw Philip Seymour Hoffman story, he actually started with alcohol abuse at a very young age. So we know that there are prevention and intervention opportunities that we can have along the way to really make sure that we're identifying people early in their disease progression. And then we're intervening in this issue.

You know, the other piece that you talked about, and again, I think it still warrants further work is what about the progression from prescription drug use to a heroin addiction. Clearly, we know that it is a progressive disease and people left untreated will often progress to more significantly harmful used patterns. But we also know that price plays a role as the DEA mentioned in terms of the progression. So, we know that there is multiple factors that really affect people's progression not only in terms of overall development of a substance use disorder but from prescription medication to heroin.

ELLMERS: Dr. Volkow. VOLKOW: Yes. And the questions you asked has intrigued many scientists and it's called -- had lead to the term of gateway hypothesis because all of the epidemiological stories have repeatedly corroborate that most individuals that become addicted to illicit substances started with nicotine or alcohol then transitioning to marijuana and then the other drugs. So the question is that just because it's more accessible that you start with nicotine or alcohol or could it be that these drugs including nicotine and alcohol and marijuana are changing your brain in such a way that it makes it more receptive to the addictiveness of drugs.

And there is data now from genetic studies and from studies in animals that suggest at least for the case of nicotine and alcohol and also marijuana that it is changing the sensitivity of the brain rewash (ph) sequence in a way that primes you to the addictiveness of these other drugs. And in the case of prescription opioids, that's also what they are observing that most of the individual that end up addicted to prescription opioids had a history of nicotine addiction earlier or has started abusing alcohol.

ELLMERS: Thank you. My last question is for Mr. Rannazzisi. You know, obviously, your agency is working with many other agencies on this issue. And I'm going to ask you a question that really falls under the FDA. But from your opinion in the work that your are doing, do you believe that some of the prescription drugs, the deterrent formulas such as, you know, for OxyContin, some of the deterrent formulas -- will that make a difference and is it feasible that if we take this approach that that is going to help on the wide and broad scope that you have outlined if we're using these deterrent forms.

RANNAZZISI: Absolutely. The abuse-deterrent formulations will make a difference. Those drugs will still be abused orally with a potentiator like a muscle relaxant or a benzo. But in the end, it's going to stop them from crushing and snorting or crushing and injecting. And we know that when you crush and inject or crush and snort, you're raising the risk of overdosing death just in that method of delivery. So yes. Do I think it's important? Absolutely, it's important.

Look at what happened with the OxyContin product. When it went from the OC to OP, you could bang that tablet with the hammer and it's not going to break. It balls up in your noise when you try and snort it. It's crazy that, you know, if you try to abuse that drug. But what did we see everybody doing? Immediately, they started moving to the oxymorphone product or the immediate release Oxy Thirties. OK. So they're adapting. If we could figure a way to get an abuse- deterrent formulation across the board, then we're going to see some significant results. Absolutely.

ELLMERS: Thank you so much for your answers and your insight on this issue. And Mr. Chairman, I yield back the remainder of my time.

BURGESS: Gentlelady yields back. The gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. Yarmuth, recognize five minutes for your questions please.

YARMUTH: Thank you very much Mr. Chairman. And I thank the panel as well for the testimony and for what is obviously a very committed effort across the spectrum of government to deal with this problem.

I'm glad to know that in a sense -- I shouldn't say glad, but it's somewhat reassuring to know that this is not just a Kentucky problem. Certainly, in my travels in my district and around the state and talking about law enforcement and with mental health professionals and everyone who's involved in this area, we have a huge problem in Kentucky.

During the first three quarters of 2013, there were at least 170 Kentuckians who died from heroin overdoses. And that was 41 more people have died the entire previous year. And it's actually 200 plus percent increase since 2011. So, we have problem that was there and growing.

And one of the young people who died was the nephew of a Kentucky State Representative Joni Jenkins, a good friend of mine, and a great representative. Her nephew Wes was -- they suspected began with prescription drugs and then moved to heroin because of expense. He died in May of 2013. And she told her story in the Courier-Journal and Op-Ed and the local Courier-Journal, and I'd like to read one of the things she said because it's -- prompts a question.

She said, "For an entire year, our family kept the addiction private. They were well aware that she had been in and out of treatment and they were working with him. But they kept it private so Wes would not suffer the social stigma of being a drug addict. I know -- now know that there is a terrible shame attached to this illness, but we have to break through the silence to find a cure." And she says "I also know that I will search for answers the rest of my life for that."

Is this is a problem that you've seen -- you're just nodding your head Mr. Botticelli? So respond to that that much of that -- or the access to treatment or the willingness to treatment is deterred because of a social stigma?

BOTTICELLI: You know -- and many of us have heard that story countless times from parents. Many of us were just in Atlanta with a conference sponsored by Chairman Rogers. And, you know, we hear that story repeatedly. And I think our collective efforts have really been to raise the visibility of ensuring that people know that addiction is disease. And this is not about chain, this is not about guilt. We know that one of the reasons why people don't seek treatment and why parents don't ask for help is because of the shame and embarrassment that's related to that. And so, part of what I think all of our federal partners are doing, is how do we raise the understanding and visibility, and quite honestly, the compassionate treatment of people with addiction -- of addictive disorders into this work.

And I think that we're seeing quite honestly a movement in terms of like we did with other disorders that were shameful and stigmatized that we have to kind of elevate the voice of parents and people in recovery so that we do know that hope is possible and that it would be easier for them to come forward and ask for help. But, you know, unfortunately, we've heard that story way too many times from parents and people who are affected.

YARMUTH: What -- have you come up with any great answers? I mean, what can we do to help that just as individual members? We do stand (ph) the country anyway.

BOTTICELLI: I mean, I think there are a couple of things that we're doing. A lot of our work -- at the Office of National Drug Control Policy, we actually established an office of recovery to really promote the fact -- we are looking at the development of recovery support services so that people in the community can see that recovery is possible. I think we have been promoting those of us who are in recovery talking very publicly about the fact that we're in recovery because it shows to other people that this is not just about death and destruction that there really is hope on the other side of this.

So, I think all of us play a role in terms of destigmatizing that. You know, just having these hearings, really show the fact that we have leadership in this country who are concerned about this. And it's not a shame. This is not a moral choice. This is not a moral failing. This is about a disease and that we have to deal with it from a public health perspective. So, I really appreciate your acknowledgment of that -- those challenges.

YARMUTH: Well, it seems to me that much of this problem involves education. I mean, I assume that when these young people or whether it's young or not, but predominantly young people began on prescription drugs. They have no idea that this is the course that they could likely be on. And I don't know whether that's a school issue, PTA issue, or what it is. But, it seems to me like information is the -- one of the greatest avenues for combatting this problem.

Anyway, Mr. Chairman, I would request unanimous consent that this Op-Ed that I mentioned from Joni Jenkins be -- made a part of the record.

BURGESS: So objections orders (ph).

YARMUTH: Thank you and I yield back.

BURGESS: Gentleman yields back his time. The Chair now recognizes the gentleman from Ohio. Mr. Johnson, five minutes for your questions please.

JOHNSON: Thank you Mr. Chairman. And I really appreciate the opportunity to hear from the panel today on this very, very important issue. You know, prescription drug and heroin abuse are very serious -- is a very serious epidemic in Ohio. And parts of my district in Eastern and South Eastern Ohio are some of the worse hit.

In 2012, five Ohioans died everyday from unintentional drug overdose with opioids both prescription and heroin as the driving factor. Attorney General Mike DeWine identified heroin as contributing to as many as 11 fatal overdoses a week. It's a major public health crisis. However, prescription opioids continue to be the lead contributor to fatal overdoses in the state. In 2012, for example, an average of 67 doses of opioids were dispensed for every Ohio resident. Lawmakers, nonprofit organizations, medical industry leaders, communities and parents across the state have been working to coordinate their response to this epidemic. But in the corner of Ohio that shares borders with three other states, communities are struggling to get drug abuse under control. Individuals identified as abusing in one state may cross state lines to escape detection and abuse in another. A non- integrated system also makes it harder to identify prescribing providers and pill mills.

So, for all of you on the panel, anyone that wants to try and respond to this, I realized that states are largely in charge of implementing their own prescription drug monitoring programs. But, in multistate areas, like I serve, the importance of working together to curb abuse cannot be emphasized enough. So, what's being done at the federal level to encourage states to share information compiled by their respective PDMP's?

BOTTICELLI: Thank you Congressman. And as you articulated, both the establishment of vibrant prescription drug monitoring programs, and quite honestly, the interstate interoperability of those programs has been key for much of the work that we've been doing on federal level. So, you know, we're happy that in 2006, we only had about 20 operable prescription drug monitoring programs in the United States. And now, we have 48. They are operable, one, in the process and unfortunately, one state that doesn't have a prescription drug monitoring program.

And as part of the strategy, we've been working with the Bureau of Justice Assistance and the Boards of Pharmacy to really look at interstate operability so that those states that share a border can make sure that they're sharing data. So now, we have 20 states that are able to share information across borders. And clearly, we have a goal of making sure that all of these programs are shared data among particularly neighboring state.

JOHNSON: I will share with you that, you know, as a 30-year I.T. professional myself, I can tell you that architecture and data standardization, interface standards, those are very, very critical components. If you don't know where you're going, any road will get you there. And it's one thing to have a monitoring system. It's quite something else to have a monitoring system that adheres to standards so that it can be effectively used. How do we make the nationwide PDMP system more effective? And what still needs to be done to fully achieve a fully integrated network?

(UNKNOWN): Congressman Johnson, thank you for your question. Clearly, the PDMP in the ability to achieve successful, effective PDMP's is critical to the law enforcement side, the public health side as well, the clinical side as well. And as Mr. Botticelli commented, we're making progress, meaning that we are better understanding the components of these PDMP's and what it is that needs to be shared and how to share them. The work that you all are doing in bracing disability, that governors and mayors are doing, saying that this is an issue that they're going to address also allows this opportunity to set the standards for what we need to share and how we will share that information across borders.

The CDC working with the FDA and the Bureau of Justice Assistance has been funding at -- randomize (ph) the prescription behavioral surveillance system which takes from 20 states, the PDMP data. They have to better understand what these factors are that increase the success of PDMPs.

JOHNSON: Let me get to one more quick question. I've got to move quickly. How can we shift drug abuse prevention efforts from the collection of silo data like we're talking about to a system in which this information isn't lost every time an individual realizes that they're being tracked and takes evasive measures like leaving a health plan for example, because not only do you have working across state lines, but an abuser that goes from one health plan to another can also hide. So, how do we solve that problem?

(UNKNOWN): And some of my colleagues can add on to this. But, you know, part of what we've been really trying to focus on is make sure that we're treating an integrating substance use issues as part of mainstream healthcare. Have really looking at things like making sure that people are getting screened and intervened as part of their over all health plan.

So that, you know, for very, very long time we had two systems of care in the United States. We've had medical care over here and behavioral healthcare over here. And that we haven't necessarily really looked at how we make sure that we are treating substance use disorders as a medical condition. So part of our goal is how, you know, more theory integration of mental health and substance use services within our primary care of settings.

JOHNSON: Sure.

(UNKNOWN): Because it's really important that we not see this as two separate issues.

JOHNSON: Mr. Chairman, I have many, many more questions obviously. This is a complex and sensitive issue for many Americans, but I ran out of time. So I yield back.

BURGESS: Thanks. The gentleman yields at this time. The Chair recognizes the gentlelady from Florida. Ms. Castor, five minutes for your questions please.

CASTOR: Thank you Mr. Chairman. And thank you to the panel very much. Just as this hearing is really heading home for me today because yesterday, I learned that the death of our friend last month was tied to her long-term opioid addiction. Her sister sent me an e- mail. I got it just yesterday. And she committed suicide. And she -- her sister said, because of her long-term addiction. So she left a daughter and a husband and an entire family. And the sister is asking, "Please, do more."

So, I hope we can all come together to tackle this. It is causing so much pain for so many families. And the State of Florida has really been at the heart of the problem. And instilling Florida, they say that every 78, every -- I can't believe it. 78 minutes, someone overdoses in the State of Florida. I'm also hearing from my local hospitals. They've had to add rooms in the NICU units of hospitals because of babies being born addicted. And these babies typically will cost a million dollars to take care of and they're in the hospital for months. So, we better invest in prevention or else, we're going to be spending a lot on the outside.

So, Mr. Rannazzisi, you know, Florida -- the general talking points are, well, Florida has improved, we -- there was huge law enforcement crack down. We have adapted a prescription drug tracking systems, the PDMP. The problem is that doctors are not using it. The last statistics that I saw, only 3.5 percent of all prescriptions being written are being checked on that database. What's your view right now in Florida? Have we made progress? What's left to do?

RANNAZZISI: I think under the leash of Attorney General Bondi and law enforcement leaders down in Florida, yes, we've made progress. Absolutely. The problem is the -- again, we're overwhelmed by the numbers. There's so many people down there in Florida. We actually have cases where Florida -- rogue pain clinic operators were funding clinics in Northern states. So when the heat is on, then they going to move up into another state. I think that we're making progress. But again, it's going to take time.

Now, the PDMP issue -- I would love to see mandated PDMP use. At any BPs (ph), the National Association of Boards of Pharmacy had gone out of their way to ensure that there's interoperability and interconnectivity between the PDMPs. I think they have 25 states that are already connected. And they've done a phenomenal job. But if no one is looking at that PDMP or very few are looking at that PDMP, it's not going to help.

CASTOR: The -- and so, do you agree that the local law enforcement efforts, I mean, what I see on the ground in my community in the Tampa Bay Area, we used to have these long lines with cars from out of state, people waiting outside in the ally for these pill mills to open up. You don't really see that anymore. But with the statistics on the rate of deaths from overdose, if something else is happening, we're not really making attempt there as it -- is it shifted to the internet, are they going out of state, is it at fault (ph), what's going on?
